The Turning

Kind, Condition, and the reach of the Tree

Compiled reading copy · Cut-year 387

Written as settled setting, for audit

The World in Brief

Vampires, werewolves, and their kin exist in the Turning, and they are part of society — accepted, employed, and needed. They are not a persecuted underclass and they are not a secret. Each is a becoming, not a species, and each is a neighbour with a job and a cost.

Every person carries two layers, and they stack.

Kind is what you are born: Human, Elf, Kitsune, Selkie, Tengu, Yumboe, and the rest. Kind is mundane. Nobody blinks at a fox-tail in a market or wings on a ridge. You are raised by a place, not by your ears. There are no Kind-nations.

Condition is what you become. Roughly three in four people acquire one over a lifetime. A Condition is a managed state with law, guild, medicine, and work attached to it. Society is built around what the Conditioned can do, and around helping them live with the cost.

Two paths lead to a becoming. At a child's tenth-year solstice, families gather at a Turning Tree. A coloured leaf falls, and a Condition is Given. The leaves hug with no colour, and the child is one of the Kept — kept whole, wanted in their own right, not a failure. Later, some people cross a threshold alone — a drowning, an oath, a death — and are Struck, with no leaf and no ceremony. Over a lifetime the split runs about sixty Given, fifteen Struck, twenty-five Kept for life.

Every Condition carries a Tithe: an upkeep that must be met to live well with it. Meet it, and you are a valued citizen. Fall behind, and a small, real edge shows. The will stays one's own. No Condition can compel another person.

Some hold that the Leaf-Mother blessed the world with these gifts, and that the Trees are her hands. Skeptics say it is simply what the Trees do. Right practice binds; right belief is argued about. The Motherfaith is one faith among several.

There is one origin Tree — the Awakening Tree, Thaeloren, on Maiethorn — and every town Tree is a living graft of it. The map of the world is a gradient of that wood's reach: sacred-dense origin, mercantile middle, thin frontier, and a storm-walled isle beyond the Trees entirely.

The surface of life is late-medieval: chartered towns, guild halls, markets, letters of credit, mills, universities. No printing press. No gunpowder. The one advancement beyond that surface comes from Condition-labor, paid for by Tithes, concentrated where those Conditions live.

It is the Years of Hands, Cut-year 387. Town Trees stand in most squares. The walk to the origin is no longer required — except where the wood is still travelling, or has failed. On Heskoren the Grafting is not finished. Kumbaan has never Turned.

This book is the world as it stands.

How to use this copy

This is a compiled world book, written as settled setting, not as a workshop. Design notes, build order, and “why we chose this” have been left out so the world can be read as a world.

Parts I–VII are the setting. Names are given as the names. Open questions that the world itself has not settled — who made the First Cut; the nature of the Mother’s limit — remain open in the text.

The GM appendix at the end is canon the table does not start knowing. It is marked. Read the world first if you want to audit it the way a player would meet it.

Rules for Daggerheart sit inside the Condition and Kind entries: Transformation cards and ancestry features, using the game’s own terms (Hope, Stress, Hit Points, Fear, range bands). Folklore and in-world papers are quoted as they are told.

The vault remains the working source of truth. This copy is for reading, marking up, and catching what feels thin, contradictory, or wrong.

Print the PDF with a wide right margin, or annotate it in any PDF reader. The HTML is the same book: searchable, with a clickable contents, and it will print if you prefer that route. Open the HTML in a word processor if you want comments in the margin.

Becomings

Every person in the Turning carries two layers, and they stack.

Kind is what you are born: the shape of a body and a bloodline. Human, Elf, Drakona, Kitsune, Selkie, Tengu, and the rest. Kind is mundane. Nobody blinks at it. It is simply the ancestry you arrived in.

Condition is what you become. Vampire, werewolf, and their kin are not species in this world. They are becomings: something happens, and a person is changed. Roughly three in four people acquire a Condition over a lifetime. One in four never do. A Condition is a managed state with law, guild, medicine, and work attached to it. Society is built around what the Conditioned can do, and around helping them live with the cost.

How a becoming arrives

There are two paths, and the split is the central social fault line of the world.

Given, at Leaf-Fall. In their tenth year, on the solstice, children gather with their families around a Turning Tree — a scion stands in every town. Leaves fall and wrap around each ten-year-old. A colour falls, and a Condition is Given; the leaf-colour names which one. It is ceremonial, expected, proper. A Given child grows up already knowing what they will become, and is trained and guilded for it. No colour, but the leaves hug the child: they are one of the Kept. The Tree keeps them as they are. That hug is a blessing in its own right. The Kept are wanted and special, not a failure and not a lack.

Struck, later. Some Conditions cannot be Given to a child. A ten-year-old cannot die and walk back. A child cannot consent to a contract. These arrive only when a person crosses a threshold later in life: the door you go through decides what you become. No leaf, no ceremony. Onlookers call it tragic, miraculous, or a little suspect. The Kept are not a closed club. A slice of them still turn.

The sorting is simple. Innate fates are Given only: the Long-Lived, the Two-Bodied, the Answered, the Phoenix. Things a child physically cannot have done are Struck only: the Returned (death), the Bound (a sworn pact). Survivable near-death doors can be foreseen by the Tree or walked through by accident, and those Conditions come Both ways: the Far-Voiced, the Stilled, the Taken-In. A Given Far-Voiced (blue leaf at ten, guild-trained) and a Struck Far-Voiced (drowned at thirty) are the same becoming and very different people.

Of the whole population, over a lifetime: about 60 percent Given at the Tree, about 15 percent Struck later, about 25 percent Kept for life. The Given and the Struck together are the three-quarters who carry a Condition. At the ceremony itself, about 40 percent of children receive no colour; about a third of those will still be Struck someday.

The Tithe

Every Condition carries a Tithe: an upkeep that must be met to live well with the becoming. Meet it, and you are a valued citizen — neighbour, colleague, family. Fall behind, and a small, real edge shows: hunger, restlessness, a Cry, a limb locking stone-still, an element that lets go in a crowded room. The infrastructure that helps people pay their Tithes is part of why society organizes around the Conditioned.

A Tithe is satisfied by ordinary work and rest. The dangerous edge is something a person can walk toward, or something a story can press; it does not seize the will. A Conditioned person remains themselves. The cost is paid in body, memory, Stress, standing, and time — never in stolen control.

Standing is not a monolith. Some Conditions are common and ordinary. Some are rare and looked up to. Some are rare and looked down on. Some are feared. One is legendary.

Nine to choose, ten in the world

Nine Conditions can be Given or Struck. A tenth — the Unbound, called the Hollow in the common tongue — is not a starting becoming. It is the downstream state a Bound enters when a term-limited contract ends without another being signed. You become Unbound only through Bound.

The Given-Over is a title, not a Condition. It is the world's name for a Bound who signs contract after contract until the being on the other side effectively holds them. Among the contract-guilds the term of art is the Forfeit. It is an NPC-tier fate.

RULES

Conditions are Daggerheart Transformation cards: a flavor line and features, at minimum a boon and a labeled Tithe, hooked to Hope, Stress, Hit Points, Fear, and Experiences. One transformation per player character. It sits in the loadout like a heritage card and does not count against domain-card limits. Feature count varies; spotlight and complex Conditions carry more than the workhorse cards. What is constant is a clean boon and a labeled Tithe on every card.

Roster

Condition	Folk still know	Path	Share of the people	Standing
Long-Lived	vampire	Given	~2.5%	rare / revered
Two-Bodied	werewolf	Given	~18%	common
Returned	zombie	Struck	~9%	normal / quietly respected
Bound	demon (by contract)	Struck	~5%	feared
The Unbound (the Hollow)	the price of a contract	Struck — chains off Bound only	~1.5%	pitied / uneasy
Far-Voiced	siren	Both	~11%	revered
The Stilled	gorgon	Both	~7%	feared / guild-regulated
The Answered	djinn	Given	~10%	wildcard
The Taken-In	leshy	Both	~12%	respected-but-looked-down / frontier
Phoenix	phoenix	Given	<0.1% (one at a time)	legendary

The Kept — the ordinary ~25 percent who receive no Condition — are not on this table. The Tree hugged them. They are wanted in their own right.

Long-Lived

Folk recognition. The old tales called them vampires. Path. Given only — a rare leaf-colour at Leaf-Fall. Share. About 2.5 percent. Standing. Rare and revered.

Aging simply stops, and nothing witnessed is ever forgotten. A Long-Lived is not a blood-drinking predator. They are an ageless keeper of memory who lives on what they learn. Where the folklore vampire fed on the living, the Long-Lived feed on knowledge; when starved they do not hunt — they fade, forget, and finally empty out. The old blood-hunger survives only as an echo: a Long-Lived can read a memory in a single drop of blood. By ancient courtesy they will not cross a threshold uninvited.

They are the world's archivists, judges, notaries, and living libraries. Courts, guilds, and archives are built around them. Their scarcity is part of the world's shape: too many deathless people and institutions would ossify. They are consulted, and a little apart.

The old courtesy. A Long-Lived waits to be asked in, always. It is held as the deepest good manners, a mark of trustworthiness — a keeper of records does not intrude — and no one quite remembers it as anything else. It is old, and it is universal among them. A Long-Lived who is refused the door feels the refusal more than they will say. It is simply how the Long-Lived have always been.

The pleasant face of the Tithe is why they hold the jobs they do. A Long-Lived wants to keep learning, so scholarship, judging, and record-keeping are self-medicating careers. Deprivation is the danger — imprisonment, a dull siege, exile somewhere with nothing new. Isolating a Long-Lived is a recognized cruelty.

They can have children and families, but none are guaranteed to inherit the Condition; most don't. They watch spouses and children grow old and die, then either stop — live on alone with the memory — or begin again and outlive that family too. This is the deepest Tithe, beneath the hunger for knowledge: the cost of the Long-Lived is measured in funerals. They are deathless, not unkillable. Violence, accident, or a failed Tithe still ends them, which keeps their numbers stable across centuries.

RULES

Ageless keepers of memory, law, and record — they live on what they learn.

- Unfading Mind — Your aging has stopped and you forget nothing you take in. Spend a Hope to recall any detail you have personally witnessed — exact and complete — or to gain advantage on a roll to recognize, appraise, or recall.
- Blood-Read — Memory rides in blood. Taste a single drop of a creature's blood (freely given, or from a wound) and you read a true memory carried in it — a fragment of what that person has lived, chosen by the GM to fit what the blood remembers. It is never predation and never harms the donor: one drop, one glimpse, and the older or more guarded the memory you reach for, the less you may get.
- The Hunger to Know (Tithe) — Place 3 Memory tokens on this card. Refill all of them whenever you learn something genuinely new — read a book you haven't, hear a true account, witness a place or event first-hand (a downtime move, or the GM's call in play). Each time you take a rest without having learned anything new since your last rest, remove a token:
 - 2 tokens: no effect.
 - 1 token: the fade begins — your action and reaction rolls are at disadvantage, and you start losing older memories (describe what slips).
 - 0 tokens: you are starving — mark a Hit Point at the start of each rest, and you cannot clear it while at 0 tokens. If you would mark your last Hit Point this way, you do not make a death move: you simply go still, mind emptied — the true death of the Long-Lived.

Two-Bodied

Folk recognition. The old tales called them werewolves. Path. Given only. Share. About 18 percent. Standing. Common.

A Two-Bodied is not a beast that overtakes a person under the moon. They are a person who carries a second, animal self that is always theirs to command. No rage, no loss of control. The second body is a useful animal partner you carry inside you. This is the common workhorse Condition: the setting's most versatile labor force — rescue, herding, wild-work, war, courier and scout work. Utility over spectacle: a second body suited to a job.

Shifting is voluntary and clean. The animal shape is not an empty suit. It carries its own personality, temperament, and inner voice, distinct from the born self, and the Two-Bodied converse with it — not aloud as a person (the animal mouth cannot form human speech) but in the head: a running second opinion. The wolf that wants to run the scent now. The hawk that trusts height over talk. The otter that finds the whole meeting tedious. It is named. It is known (“that’s Bramble, her otter”). Townsfolk come to recognize its moods. It never takes the wheel. The change and every action stay the person’s to command. What it does is nag, want, and color: a live companion you happen to be.

The Condition runs in families. Children of a Two-Bodied parent are far more likely to be Given it at their Awakening, and usually as the same animal. Whole bloodlines are wolf-folk, hawk-folk, otter-folk. A first-in-the-line, or one who breaks type, is notable.

The other self is a real, natural animal, roughly between a housecat and a large wolf, bear, boar, or horse in size — no bigger, nothing mythic. A real animal does exactly what that animal really does: a hawk flies, an otter swims and holds its breath, a bear is strong. The hard limits are size (housecat-to-bear, never a giant hawk or a dire wolf) and no myth (no roc, no kelpie). In the animal form there are no hands, no person’s mind at work, no speech-as-a-person, no tools. A flying Two-Bodied is a superb scout and courier but is not a Tengu — a Tengu is a person aloft, with hands to carry and fight and a human mind and voice in the air. An aquatic Two-Bodied swims brilliantly but works the water as a beast, not a tool-using Answered or a true amphibious person. The body is a magnificent animal. It is not a person wearing fur.

Because the upkeep is simply being the animal sometimes, most Two-Bodied satisfy it without thinking — their jobs demand the animal form anyway. The restless forced-shift is the edge: it strikes at the worst moment (mid-negotiation, mid-stealth), costs a Stress, and never takes the wheel.

RULES

A person who carries a second, animal self — not a beast that overtakes them.

- The Other Self (boon) — You have a second body: a specific real animal, chosen when you become Two-Bodied. You may shift between your two selves at will, as an action — the change is always yours to command, no Stress and no roll (your gear melds with you and returns when you change back). In animal form you gain all three:
- Natural build — your animal's real gifts are yours: a natural weapon (teeth, claws, antler, hoof) you can attack with, plus the beast's movement — a wolf's run, an otter's swim, a hawk's flight. The natural weapon uses your normal attack; it does not stack extra damage dice on top of a wielded weapon. You are one or the other.
- A signature capability — chosen with the GM to fit the animal: e.g. a hawk's see a mouse from the sky, a wolf's run a scent for miles, a bear's shrug off a blow (advantage on the fitting rolls, or a small once-per-scene effect the GM sets). One signature to start.
- An animal Experience — choose one Experience reflecting your animal's nature (e.g. "Wolf's Nose," "Cat's Balance," "Bear's Strength"), usable only in animal form.
- A voice, not a driver — your other self has its own name, temperament, and inner voice you can converse with. It is pure roleplay: it flavors and nags, grants no mechanical bonus on its own, and can never take an action you don't choose.
- Both Must Be Lived (Tithe) — If a full day passes without time spent as your other self, it grows restless. The next time you roll with Fear, you shift into it whether you meant to or not, and mark a Stress. You stay fully in control — only the timing isn't yours. Shift back normally.

Growth. You start with one animal-form Experience and one signature capability. Whenever you would gain an Experience, you may attach a new animal-form Experience to your other self (usable only in animal form). Your signature capability stays one, with a single exception: a second signature is a once-ever milestone, never a routine pick. It is granted by the GM as the payoff of a genuine story arc (a season lived almost entirely in your other self, a defining trial passed in that shape), and it is the only way the capability count ever grows.

Returned

Folk recognition. The old tales called them zombies. Path. Struck only — it requires death. Share. About 9 percent. Standing. Normal and quietly respected.

The Returned are not rotting, mindless corpses. A Returned is a person who died with something unfinished, and whose purpose keeps them walking: calm, deliberate, unafraid of death because they have already met it. Where the folklore zombie decays, the Returned persist.

You cannot be Given this at age ten. Someone dies with a thing left undone strong enough to hold them, and they get back up. Society hands them the jobs that kill the living — plague wards, mine collapses, battlefield recovery, tending and speaking for the dead. They are solemn, dependable, the people you send where the living cannot safely go. They are unshaken by gore and death, and death itself struggles to keep them.

The Tithe is emotional as much as mechanical. A Returned is only steady while they have a reason. Neglect it and they cool — literally and socially. The living can tell a settling Returned at a touch. The Returned build their lives around their purpose with almost religious care. Their returns are counted: each Refuse to Fall burns a Hope slot, so a long-walking Returned is a person you can see running out of comebacks. Blaze of Glory remains the death they can choose: after a life of refusing rest, going out spectacularly on their own terms rather than on the last scar.

When the unfinished thing is finally done, they have a choice death denied them. They may Settle — lie down and take the rest they skipped, at last — or become one of the Kept, laying the Condition aside and living out the rest of their days as a mortal again. Taking up a new Purpose instead keeps them Returned and walking. That is a major character beat, coordinated with the GM.

RULES

You died with something unfinished. It keeps you walking.

- Unfinished Business (boon) — You have already died once, and death’s grip on you is loose. When you make a death move, you gain a fourth option: Refuse to Fall. Instead of dying you give out — taken out of the current scene, “unstrung” — and you pull yourself back together by the next long rest (describe how). Like any brush with death, coming back leaves a mark: cross out a Hope slot as a scar. If you would cross out your last Hope slot this way, you cannot Refuse to Fall — the unfinished thing finally lets go, and that death is true and final (per the SRD scar rule: crossing out your last Hope slot ends the character’s journey). Your other death-move options are unchanged — you may still choose Blaze of Glory, or gamble on Risk It All and simply die if it fails. Refuse to Fall is the steady road back, and it is finite — counted in scars. You are also unshaken by the dead and dying — automatically pass rolls to resist fear, horror, or despair from corpses, gore, and deathly places.
- The Tether (Tithe) — Name your Purpose — the unfinished thing that holds you here (write it on the card). While you can still act toward it, you are steady. If a long rest passes in which you did nothing in service of your Purpose, you begin to settle: mark a Stress that can’t be cleared until you next act toward it, and your touch runs cold — living creatures you touch (or that touch you) feel a bone-deep wrongness and mark a Stress, and you have disadvantage on rolls to comfort, persuade, or charm the living until you act toward your Purpose again.

When the Purpose is fulfilled. Settle, become Kept, or name a new Purpose and keep walking.

Bound

Folk recognition. The old tales called them demons — but in this world the demon is a contract, not a bloodline. Path. Struck only — a child cannot consent to a contract. Share. About 5 percent. Standing. Feared.

The Bound are the only Conditioned who chose it. In some extremity they swore a contract with something on the other side, and got power in exchange for terms. The horror is contractual, not infernal: a debt and a counterparty that always watches the ledger. This is distinct from Infernis, Daggerheart’s demon-blooded ancestry. Bound is acquired, never born.

Society fears them. The power is real, the terms are binding, and a Bound who falls behind is collateral. Society also needs them. A Bound's sworn word is literally binding, and they know a lie when they hear one, so they are the world's enforcers, oath-keepers, witnesses, and debt-arbiters. When a treaty absolutely must hold, a Bound swears to it.

The counterparty may be chosen at creation, or left unknown as a thread to discover: a demon or lesser power (a named, bargaining entity); a cosmic-horror intelligence (vast, indifferent, wrong); or unknown even to the Bound — they do not know what holds their note.

The only sure release is to kill the thing that holds the contract — but a patron that can grant power can often sense the intent forming, so plotting it is its own peril. Term-limited contracts instead simply end, releasing the Bound and collecting the Pledge. What walks away is Unbound.

True flight may be contracted, but the sky is spoken for. It is the province of the Tengu and, in legend, the Phoenix. A contract for flight is uncommon and never clean: it grants literal, visible wings (or a stranger tell — a shadow that lifts, feet that will not touch ground) that a Bound cannot furl or hide, marking them plainly as something that made a bargain, the way a Phoenix's fire marks them. Most who want the sky are simpler served by gliding or a saving slow-fall. True sustained flight is a GM's call, priced with heavier Terms and a Pledge to match. It is not one of the ordinary, hide-in-a-crowd boons.

The Given-Over is the world's name for a Bound who keeps signing — power after power, pledge after pledge — first out of fear of paying what they already owe (sign another contract to defer the debt), then because it becomes too much to stop. Bit by bit they give themselves over until the being effectively holds them. This is a narrative title, not a playable Condition. A person who has signed away nearly all of themselves is no longer really playable. The plain name is the Given-Over; among the contract-guilds, the Forfeit.

RULES

You swore something to something, and it answered. Now you both keep the terms.

- The Granted Power — When you became Bound, you named what you wanted, and the contract granted it. With the GM, choose one modest-but-real boon your class doesn't give you — e.g. you can never become lost (always know true north and the way back), you don't need to breathe, you need no food or water, you can speak and understand any tongue, you always know when someone lies to you, or a similar small, defined edge. Invoke active boons by marking a Stress; passive ones simply work. Flight, if granted at all, follows the marked-bargain terms above.
- The Terms (Tithe) — Your contract carries Terms written on the card: a standing obligation the counterparty exacts (e.g. “never refuse a sincere plea,” “collect what is owed,” “tell no lie on a holy day”). Keep the Terms and the power is clean. Break a Term, or miss a payment, and the contract collects: the GM gains Fear; until you make restitution (a defined act, GM-adjudicated) your Granted Power costs a Hit Point instead of Stress; and The Whisper begins — while you owe a debt, when you roll with Fear the GM may voice an intrusive thought or a plausible lie the counterparty wants you to believe. You may act against it freely, but shutting it out costs a Stress. The debt compounds each time you fall further behind. The Whisper suggests; it never commands. The counterparty cannot take control of you.
- The Pledge — At signing you also named what you would give when the contract ends — a part of yourself (an eye, a leg, your capacity for fear, your memory of home). Written on the card. You keep it while the contract runs. When a term-limited contract comes due, the counterparty releases you and collects the Pledge, and you become one of the Unbound (colloquially, the Hollow).

The Unbound

Folk recognition. Not a monster from the old tales — the price of a contract. Colloquially, the Hollow. Path. Struck only; chains off Bound. Share. About 1.5 percent — only the subset of Bound whose contracts were term-limited rather than open-ended. Standing. Pitied / uneasy.

When the term ends, the counterparty releases the person and collects the Pledge — the part of themselves they named at signing — and they walk away unbound: free of the contract at last, but left with a hole where a piece of them used to be, exactly as agreed. The Condition is titled for the release. The common tongue fixes on the cost and calls them the Hollow. Both are true: a freedom, and an absence.

The Pledge was chosen up front, at the signing. You knew what you would owe. So the loss is both grief and gift: the hole is also an immunity. People are not afraid of the Unbound. They are unsettled by the absence in them. Where the Long-Lived must keep learning to stay whole, the Unbound must keep connecting to stay quiet — the opposite fuel.

A player cannot simply choose the Unbound at character creation. It is a downstream state: you become Unbound only after playing through (or arranging at session zero, with the GM) an actual Bound contract — establishing what the contract was, what you Pledged, and the moment the term came due and it was collected. The Absence must be a specific, agreed loss with real weight, not a free immunity.

RULES

You paid what you promised. Something is missing now — and the missing place is quiet, and strong.

- The Absence — Name what the contract took (the Bound Pledge). You permanently lose it — fictionally and, where relevant, mechanically — and you are immune to anything that works through it. The bigger the hole, the wider the immunity and the heavier the daily lack; agree the cash-out with the GM at the moment you become Hollow. Three lanes:
- A capacity of the mind (fear, grief, love, the ability to lie, memory of a person or place) → immune to effects that work through it (gave up fear → auto-pass fear/horror/intimidation; gave up deceit → you cannot lie, and no lie deceives you). Mostly fiction plus a clean immunity.
- A sense of the body (an eye, hearing, taste) → a fictional loss with a sharp edge (gave up an eye → disadvantage on rolls needing depth/distance, but immune to gaze- and sight-based effects: the Stilled stilling, blinding light, illusions you must see).
- A part of the body (a leg, a hand) → fictional loss plus a standing penalty the group accepts, offset by immunity to pain and effects through it (and often a prosthetic or Condition-crafted replacement in the fiction).
- The Quiet (Tithe) — Place 3 Quiet tokens on this card; begin play with them filled. Spend a Quiet token to do what the hole makes easy — to feel nothing where feeling would cost you: ignore a fear/despair/grief effect, push through what should stop you, stay perfectly calm and empty under pressure (mark nothing, take no Stress; the emptiness carries you). Refill all tokens on a long rest spent in genuine human connection — company, warmth, a shared meal, being known. At 0 tokens the pull turns loud: while empty, whenever a bargain, favor, or offer of power is on the table, the GM may present it as unusually reasonable, and refusing to reach for it costs a Stress. Suggestion, never compulsion — you can always say no; it just aches. This is the road back to Bound, and from there toward the Given-Over spiral.

Far-Voiced

Folk recognition. The old tales called them sirens. Path. Both. Share. About 11 percent. Standing. Revered.

A Far-Voiced is not an irresistible song that lures the unwilling to their death. Their voice has total emotional fidelity: it carries exactly as far, and exactly as true, as the Far-Voiced means it to. The old trope's horror — a song that overrides your will — is not how this works. The danger runs the other direction, into the Far-Voiced themselves.

A Far-Voiced's voice is never drowned out — by distance, by storm, by battle-noise, by water — and it never says less than it means. That is why the signal network runs on them: relay-singers post along coasts, roads, and border-towns to carry warnings, alarms, and orders faster and farther than any horn or drum. That is why courts and treaties want them as witnesses: a Far-Voiced's own voice betrays real feeling the moment they are under pressure, so their sworn word is trusted precisely because they are bad at lying under strain. That is why they fill concert halls: emotion, delivered audibly and exactly, is the whole art form. They are revered rather than feared — but a Far-Voiced who cannot master the channel is a genuine hazard to everyone in earshot, which is exactly why guild training exists.

The two paths read differently. A Given Far-Voiced drew the colour at the Awakening and spent childhood guild-trained — breath control, projection, the discipline of venting on purpose — controlled, professional, poised. A Struck Far-Voiced nearly drowned. The door is surviving drowning. They came up with the voice raw and untrained, the undertow already pulling before anyone taught them to swim it. Same Condition, very different person. No leaf, no ceremony: it reads to onlookers as a miracle, or as faintly uncanny. A Struck Far-Voiced usually needs a guild's help fast, before they learn the hard way what happens at zero tokens in public.

The pleasant face of the Tithe is why the jobs exist. Deliberate, controlled venting — performance, ritual song, relay-calls — is how a working Far-Voiced manages the channel, so the careers that need a big voice are also the careers that keep one healthy. The guild drilling (breath work, scheduled performance, the discipline of singing it out before a shift ends) exists because an un-vented Far-Voiced is not just unpleasant to be near. A Cry in a crowded hall or a command tent is a real, documented hazard.

A Bound detects others' lies. A Far-Voiced betrays their own feeling.

RULES

Your voice carries exactly as far, and exactly as true, as you mean it to.

- The Carrying Voice — Your voice is never lost to distance, weather, noise, or water, and it lands with the emotional weight you intend. Spend a Hope to be heard clearly and understood by everyone you intend, across any distance or chaos in the scene, or to land a rally, warning, plea, or calming word with exact emotional force — gain advantage on that roll.
- The Undertow (Tithe) — Place 3 Breath tokens on this card. Whenever you feel a strong emotion in a scene — grief, terror, rage, joy — you must vent it: sing, cry out, laugh, weep, something audible, before the scene ends. If you don't, remove a token:
 - 2 tokens: no effect.
 - 1 token: the undertow pulls — your voice starts leaking whatever you're actually feeling underneath your words. You have disadvantage on rolls to persuade, deceive, or perform a feeling you don't hold.
 - 0 tokens: the next strong emotion you feel escapes as an involuntary Cry — everyone within earshot marks a Stress as your raw feeling crashes into them (the GM may instead gain a Fear for a crowd or hostile scene). The Cry empties you: mark a Stress yourself, then refill to 2 tokens — it's out now, one way or another.

The Cry costs listeners Stress and costs the Far-Voiced a Stress. It never compels an action, a belief, or a roll. Nobody's will bends. It is an emotional gut-punch, not a command.

The Stilled

Folk recognition. The old tales called them gorgons. Path. Both. Share. About 7 percent. Standing. Feared and guild-regulated.

One of the Stilled is not a monster whose gaze is a weapon. They are a person who can still things: arrest a wound, freeze a fight before it turns lethal, hold a struggling patient steady under the knife. The old trope's horror — turn-to-stone as a curse you inflict on others — is not how this works. The danger is that the stillness has to come from somewhere, and if one of the Stilled doesn't keep moving, it starts settling into them.

A gaze that can hold a moment still: a bleeding wound stops bleeding, a spreading poison stops spreading, a blade already swinging hangs a beat too long. Peacekeepers want them on a riot line — a stilled brawl is a brawl that didn't turn into a massacre. Surgeons and medics want them in the theatre — a patient held perfectly still is a patient who survives the knife. They are feared and licensed rather than simply revered, because the same gaze that stops a wound bleeding can, misused or lost to anger, hold a person still forever. Licenses, oversight, and a strict code govern who may still and why.

Old folklore's snake-hair survives as flavor, not mechanics: hair stirs faintly when something nearby has gone dangerously still — a held breath, a nocked arrow, a predator about to spring. A tell their trade has learned to read.

The two paths read differently. A Given Stilled drew the colour at the Awakening and trained young under guild discipline — knows exactly how much stillness they can spend and how to keep moving to shed it, composed and professional. A Struck Stilled actually survived being turned to stone — held rigid, unbreathing, for however long it took someone to reverse it — and came back with the stillness now living inside them, unpracticed and closer to the surface. The door is surviving being turned to stone: petrified by another of the Stilled's gaze, a trap, a curse, an accident, and returning to flesh. No leaf, no ceremony. Onlookers call it a miracle, a mercy, or a little unnerving, depending on who did the reversing. A Struck member of the Stilled usually needs a guild's help fast, before an unmanaged Grey teaches them the hard way what a seizing feels like in public.

The Stilled drill hard, spar often, and stay physically busy almost as a matter of professional identity. Every use of the gaze banks a little grey, so the guilds build constant motion into the job itself — patrols, practice bouts, dance as therapy — to work it back out before it settles. An unlicensed or careless one of the Stilled who lets the Grey fill and seize is a real, documented hazard: to themselves first, but a stilled doorknob is one thing and a stilled hand on a weapon is another. The guild's oversight is strict rather than ceremonial.

RULES

You can hold a moment still. The stillness has to come from somewhere — and if you don't move it along, it settles into you.

- The Stilling Gaze — You may still a wound, a spreading harm, or a struggle you can see: stop a creature's bleeding or the spread of a poison/disease, or render a target Restrained for a beat — held fast, unable to act, until they mark a Stress to break free or the scene moves on. It is brief and precise; nothing you still this way is harmed by the stilling itself. But the stillness has to come from somewhere: each time you use the Gaze, add a Grey token.
- The Grey (Tithe) — The stillness you spend collects in you, and if you don't work it back out, it settles. Place Grey tokens on this card, starting at 0 — this is a filling clock, not a draining one. Add a Grey token each time you use the Stilling Gaze, and add one whenever a rest passes without real, vigorous exertion (a hard spar, a dance, heavy labor, a fight — anything that works the body). Clear one token for each scene you spend in that kind of exertion. The stillness rises:
 - 1 token: no effect.
 - 2 tokens: the grey creeps in — your joints stiffen; you have disadvantage on Agility rolls and on rolls to evade.
 - 3 tokens (full): the stillness seizes. The next time you use the Stilling Gaze, or the next time you take damage, one of your own limbs locks stone-still — useless until it's tended and rested off (describe it: an arm, a leg, your jaw). The GM may instead gain a Fear: something small and nearby — a doorknob, a cup, a patch of ground — turns permanently to stone, collateral of the seizing. Afterward, clear back to 1 token.

The seizing only ever locks the Stilled's own body, or harmless scenery. It never petrifies another creature and never takes a PC's turn away from its player. Nobody's will bends; nobody else pays the debt.

The Answered

Folk recognition. The old tales called them djinn — jinni, wish-granting spirits in lamps. Path. Given only. Share. About 10 percent. Standing. Wildcard.

An Answered is not a wish-granting spirit trapped in a vessel, bound to serve whoever holds it. They are a person one of the four elements answered at the Awakening, and will now go on answering for the rest of their life. No wishes, no master, no bottle: an element that talks back to the Answered's hands the way a native tongue talks back to a native speaker.

At Leaf-Fall, an Answered child's leaf does not just mark them Given — its shade names which element answered: Ember (fire), Tide (water), Root (earth and stone), or Gale (air). From that day the element is theirs to speak to, not summon or command — coaxed like clay, never conjured like a spirit.

That is why the Answered run the craft guilds built around their element. Ember-Answered glasswrights and smiths who don't need a furnace at full heat. Tide-Answered shipwrights and dyers who can bend a hull's planks or set a colour without steam or mordant. Root-Answered masons and potters who coax stone and clay without chisel or wheel. Gale-Answered sailmakers and instrument-makers who cut and voice their work with the wind's own help. Watch rotations, escort work, and firefighting crews give them a steady outlet as well.

They are never one thing. Which element answers, and what temperament came with it, is different every time. An even-tempered Root-Answered potter and a short-fused Ember-Answered smith have nothing in common but the name. Some guilds prize them above any other artisan. Some households are wary of hosting one whose element runs hot. The leaf-shade names the element; it does not tell you which kind of person you are getting until you meet them. That is why "wildcard" sticks as a label.

Real, purposeful use of the element keeps an Answered steady, so apprenticeships run long and workshops exist to give them work. One of the Answered kept idle, grieving, or benched too long is a genuine hazard to be near, and every guild hall has a story about the time someone's untended element finally let go in a crowded room.

There is no Struck door. An element answers at the Awakening, or it does not. This is not a bargain. Contrast the Bound, who swore a contract with a counterparty.

RULES

An element answered you at the Awakening. It still does — and it still expects to be spoken to.

Choose your element at creation — Ember, Tide, Root, or Gale. It sets both features below.

- The Answering Hand (boon) — Your element obeys your hands without tool, forge, or force — glass blown with no furnace, a hull bent with no steam, stone coaxed with no chisel — granting advantage on any action roll to shape, repair, wield, or read something made of your element. In the moment, it answers too: spend a Hope to invoke your element's Reach (see the table). The Reach is always available; the Tithe below is what wears down if you don't use it.
- The Untended Element (Tithe) — Place 3 tokens on this card. Refill all of them whenever you invoke your Reach in earnest — a rescue, a fight that mattered, real work of your trade (not idle showing-off). Each time you take a rest having done none of that since your last, remove a token. At 2 tokens: no effect. At 1 and 0, the element starts speaking for itself — see the table.

Element	Reach — spend a Hope	1 token (restless)	0 tokens (it lets go)
Ember (fire)	Loose fire at a target within Very Close range: make an attack roll (Instinct or Strength). On a success, deal magic damage in d6s equal to your Proficiency and the target is temporarily On Fire .	You run hot — disadvantage on action rolls needing a steady hand or a cool head (stealth, precision, composure).	You flare — mark a Stress ; searing heat rolls off you and anyone within Very Close must give ground or work through it (scorched cloth, singed hair — no direct damage). Refill to 2.
Tide (water)	Move like water: breathe and swim freely as though water were air, flow out of a fall or a grapple unharmed, or slick the ground within Very Close — creatures there must succeed on an Agility Roll to move out of it.	You run thin — disadvantage on action rolls needing brute force or holding your ground.	You flood — mark a Stress ; water and mud spread under you (Very Close), and you and everyone in it must make an Agility Roll to move out until it drains. Refill to 2.
Root (earth/stone)	Turn skin to bark and stone until the spotlight leaves you: reduce the severity of the next damage you take by one threshold , and gain advantage on rolls to resist being moved, knocked down, or Restrained.	You run slow — disadvantage on Agility rolls.	You calcify — mark a Stress ; you become Restrained by your own stiffening body until you or an ally clears it with a successful action roll. Refill to 2.
Gale (air)	Move like wind: on a move, reach anywhere within Close range with no roll even under pressure; or a sudden gust slams a door, knocks something loose, or carries your voice clearly across a storm.	You run wild — disadvantage on action rolls needing careful aim or a steady stance.	You gust — mark a Stress ; uncontrolled wind scatters every loose or unsecured thing within Very Close (dropped weapons, papers, smoke, dust — GM adjudicates). Refill to 2.

Every 0-token consequence lands on the Answered's own body or the air, water, and ground immediately around them. It never targets or harms another creature directly, and never bends anyone's will. Nobody is compelled; nobody else pays the debt.

The Taken-In

Folk recognition. The old tales called them leshy — trickster forest-spirits that led travelers in circles until they died. Path. Both. Share. About 12 percent. Standing. Respected but looked-down; frontier.

One of the Taken-In is not a haunting and not a lure. They are a person the wild took partway into itself and gave back changed: bark at the knuckles, moss in the hair, a spread of antler or a knot of root somewhere on the body, and green things that lean toward them. The wild lives in them now, and answers them — which is exactly why the hard land gets worked at all.

They can coax growth, read the wild, and move through it unseen and unlost. The frontier runs on them. A Taken-In steward makes thin soil yield, keeps a herd through a bad winter, walks a forest without ever losing north, and knows a day out which way the weather turns. They are society's farmers, foresters, herders, and frontier-wardens.

The cities and their guilds need the grain, timber, and wardens the Taken-In provide, and eat well because of them — but one of the Taken-In is dirt-handed, backcountry, and no longer quite human to look at. The bark and antler unsettle people who have never left the paved districts. Prosperous farm-country reveres them. Polite city society finds them a little coarse, a little uncanny, and keeps them at arm's length.

The two paths read differently. A Given Taken-In drew the green at the Awakening and grew up in it — a farm or forest child comfortable in their half-wild skin, the change coming on gentle and known. A Struck Taken-In got lost and dying in the deep wild — days without a path, ready to lie down — and the wild took them in rather than let them die, remaking them partway to keep them. They come back more uncanny, more overgrown, and quietly unsure whether they walked out a person or something the forest sent.

Their work is their upkeep. A life spent on soil, among growing things, under open sky keeps the green in them fed without a thought. The Tithe only bites when one of the Taken-In is pulled off the land: a long sea voyage, a stretch in a stone gaol, a season stuck in a walled city on a lord's business. Old frontier custom is to send them home before they wilt. City hosts who must keep one indoors learn to fill the room with potted green and open windows — a courtesy that doubles as keeping their guest from going to seed on the parlour floor.

RULES

The wild took you in and gave you back green. It still lives in you — and it needs living things around it.

- The Green Word (boon) — Growing things heed you. You have advantage on action rolls to forage, track, navigate wild land, calm or read an animal, or find your way, and you never become lost in a natural place. In the moment, the green answers:
- Spend a Hope to make roots, vines, and brush erupt from any natural ground within Close range: make an attack roll (Instinct or Strength) against a target there — on a success, deal physical damage in d6s equal to your Proficiency and the target is temporarily Restrained; or
- Spend a Hope, while in any natural cover (brush, trees, tall grass, roots, soil), to draw it around you and become Hidden; or
- Spend a Hope to force sudden, useful growth — a branch bridging a gap, a screen of thicket, a root ladder, a burst of ripe forage — GM sets the scale.
- The Rooting (Tithe) — Place 3 Green tokens on this card. Refill all of them whenever you take a rest in true contact with living land — soil under you, open sky, a forest, a field, anything growing. Each time you take a rest cut off from it — sealed in stone, deep indoors, at sea, on dead ground — remove a token:
- 2 tokens: no effect.
- 1 token: you wilt — your green browns and sheds, and you have disadvantage on action rolls to resist fear, despair, or exhaustion (the wild in you is starving and it drags at you).
- 0 tokens: you go to seed — mark a Stress; you are Vulnerable until you next touch living land, and the wild reaches for any it can find (weeds crack the flagstones, a beam sprouts leaves, roots buckle the floor — the room around you goes riotously overgrown). The GM may instead gain a Fear in a tense scene. Reach living land and refill to 2.

The go-to-seed growth erupts from the ground and structures around the Taken-In. It never entangles, targets, or harms another creature directly, and never bends anyone's will. Nobody is compelled; nobody else pays the debt.

Phoenix

Folk recognition. They are called what the stories call them: the Phoenix. Every other Condition wears a plain, euphemistic title — the Long-Lived, the Returned, the Far-Voiced — because those becomings pass unremarked in the crowd, and the quiet name is their camouflage. The Phoenix cannot pass, cannot hide, and the whole world already knows the story. The naming itself marks them as singular. Path. Given only. No threshold can Strike one into being. Share. Less than 0.1 percent — and there is only ever one at a time in the entire world. Standing. Legendary.

A Phoenix is not a bird of eternal, cost-free rebirth. They are a person who burns down to ash and rises again, but not unchanged and not forever. Each death takes a piece of who they were; each life is a little further from the first. Where the Long-Lived never die and the Returned refuse to stay dead, a Phoenix does die — completely — and comes back a new turn of the same soul, carrying fewer and fewer of the old one's memories.

When the current Phoenix finally ends (spends their last life), the Tree gives the leaf to a single child, somewhere, and the next one begins. So a Phoenix is not rare the way a good harvest is rare. They are singular: the one living person the whole world's phoenix-stories are currently about. The Tree names them once a generation or once an age, and then not again until they're gone. Almost nobody has ever met them. They are known through stories.

This makes a Phoenix a fault-line a whole city forms around. In a single town they may be, all at once:

- Revered — proof the Leaf-Mother is real, a living miracle paraded on holy days;
- Worshipped — followers who believe touching them, or their ashes, blesses or heals;
- Hunted — those who want their ashes, their blood, their feathers, or their death (some believe a Phoenix's ash grants a life; some just want the one irreplaceable thing gone);
- Hated and feared — skeptics who call them a fraud, faiths who call them heresy, rulers who can't stand a symbol they don't control.

They cannot hide in a crowd. A Phoenix is the Phoenix, and everyone has heard the stories. This is the true weight of the Condition, heavier than any Tithe: you are the most known person alive, and the world has already decided what you mean.

A Phoenix is a spotlight Condition. The group and GM agree to it together, the way a table agrees to a campaign about a chosen one, and the player commits to roleplaying the legend: the constant recognition, the followers and hunters, the impossibility of an ordinary life. It plays as a slow-burning, finite-lives arc, not a casual pick. It also works as a recurring legendary NPC whose rebirths a party witnesses across an age.

Day to day, a Phoenix pays nothing — no hunger, no rooting, no venting. The whole cost is spent at death, in self: a little less memory, one fewer life. The real upkeep is social and unrelenting: being the only one. A Phoenix cannot walk a market unrecognized, cannot refuse the meaning others pour into them, cannot stop the worshippers or the hunters from finding them, and cannot grieve a rebirth in private. The stories are heavy with loss for a reason — Phoenixes who rose so many times they forgot their own children, who ended not by a hunter's hand but by simply choosing to stay dead rather than come back as still less of themselves. A Phoenix late in their cycle is a person made mostly of legend, with almost none of their first life left inside.

They can furl the wings of fire and pass, for a moment, as ordinary. The moment they fly, everyone watching knows what they are.

RULES

You are the only one. You will die, as you have died before — and rise, a few more times, and no more.

The living-fire boons (a Phoenix simply is these — no cost unless noted):

- Deathless to Flame — You cannot be harmed by fire or heat of any kind: you take no damage from fire and can walk through, stand in, and breathe within flame unharmed. Ash and cinder are home.
- Wings of Fire — You have wings of living flame and you can fly. While flying, you may mark a Stress after an adversary attacks you to gain a +2 bonus to your Evasion against that attack. (You can furl the wings to pass for ordinary — but the moment you fly, everyone watching knows what you are.)
- Kindle — Spend a Hope to loose a burst of fire at a target within Close range: make an attack roll (Instinct or Strength); on a success, deal magic damage in d6s equal to your Proficiency and the target is temporarily On Fire.

The rebirth:

- Rise From Ash — When you make a death move, you gain a fourth option: Rise From Ash. Your body burns to nothing and reforms whole by the end of the next scene — you return with all Hit Points and Stress cleared, standing in your own ashes. But rebirth burns part of who you were: with the GM, name a piece of the old life that did not come back — a memory, a face, a skill, a fear, a name you used to answer to. You come back you, but lighter, and a little more like something that has done this before.
- The Dwindling (Tithe) — Rebirth is finite, and paid in self. Each Rise From Ash permanently crosses out a Hope slot, as a scar does; your lives are counted in Hope. When you would cross out your last Hope slot to Rise, you cannot — that death is your true and final one, and this turn of the soul ends for good (per the SRD scar rule: crossing out your last Hope slot ends the character's journey). Then, somewhere, a leaf falls for the next Phoenix. The dread is the count: everyone at the table can see how many risings are left, and so, quietly, can the Phoenix.

Rise From Ash acts only on the Phoenix's own body and Hope. Kindle is an ordinary attack, no different from a torch or a blade in what it may target. Nothing here compels another creature's will.

Peoples

Kinds

You are raised by a place, not by your ears.

A Kind is a birth-shape. Nobody blinks at a fox-tail in a Maiethorn market or wings on a Heskoren ridge. Conditions are the becoming the world organizes around; Kinds are the body you brought to the Turning Tree. There are no Kitsune kingdoms, no Selkie thalassocracies, no Tengu mountain-empires.

What the custom Kinds have are hearths — terrain they were born to, where they are densest, not exclusive. A hearth is a forest, a coast, a ridge, a dry country, an isle. It is not a flag.

The one exception that proves the rule is the Yumboes: they are rare off Kumbaas because of distance (the storm-wall), not because Kind is a nationality. On the isle they are ordinary. On the mainland they are a sailor’s tale. Same people; the map did that, not a racial law.

Kind, Condition, place

Layer	What it tells you	What it does not
Kind	Birth-shape; sometimes a hearth (coast, ridge, wood, isle)	Loyalty, faith, legal standing, which country
Condition	What they became (~75%); Tithe; guild/licence	Ancestry
Place	The drift they speak, the institution-names they use, the polity that vouched them	What ears they have

A Kitsune clerk on the Lestrand docks, a Tengu pilgrim in Threnmaieth, a Selkie vouching-witness in Vaethorn — none of those is a mistake. The interesting collision is always Kind × Condition × place.

Kinds do not carry a Tithe. A Tithe belongs to a Condition.

The four custom hearths

Kitsune — three hearths, one Kind. The fox-born already come in three Foxes: Wilds, Snows, and Sands. That is the distribution, written into the body: not one fox-country, three grounds. They marry and mingle; a child takes after one parent's line. You meet Kitsune in every port and every court. You meet more of a given Fox where that ground is.

Fox	Hearth	Where on the map
Wilds (red / forest)	tangled wood, hedgerow, Motherwood	densest in Maiethorn's Motherwood and Heskoren's deep forests
Snows (white / high cold)	high snow, pale open country	densest on Maiethorn's central range and Heskoren's highland spines
Sands (pale / dry)	dry hills, rain-shadow, sand-country	densest in Maiethorn's Rain-Shadow — the leeward east of the central range, the one true dry country in the known world

A Fox of the Sands in a wet Strandoren harbour is unremarkable (people move). A town in the Rain-Shadow with no fox-born at all would be the thing worth asking about.

Old Kitsune hearths still have a word for a fourth fox no one is born as anymore. The word is kept; the Fox is not. A grandmother will say it and not explain.

Selkie — the coasts. Selkies belong to two homes at once, so their hearth is the line between — strand, estuary, cold harbour, the towns that face water. Densest on Strandoren's indented coasts (the continent is almost all shoreline). Common in Maiethorn's western ports on the inner sea. Present on Heskoren's wild coast, thinner inland. Not native to Kumbaan — a Selkie who makes that crossing is a story, not a population.

Inland Selkies exist (the skin Anchors; they can always find their way back to water). They are simply fewer, and they miss the place they aren't, which they consider normal.

Tengu — the ridges. Tengu hearths are peaks, cliff-shelves, and the wind that lives there. Densest on Maiethorn's central range and Heskoren's highland spines — the two continents that actually have killing height. Rare as a settled people on low Strandoren; the ones you meet there are usually sky-couriers (a family, a perch on a clock-tower, a run over the inner sea), not a ridge-town transplanted to a quay.

Tengu settlements cling to crags and are reached by wing or by rope. A lowlander arriving on foot is a guest who climbed; that is the courtesy.

They keep a running, half-teasing rivalry with the Selkies — sky-folk and sea-folk each convinced their element is the one worth belonging to. That rivalry is colour, not a border.

Yumboe — the isle. Kumbaen, and almost nowhere else. Mythic-rare off the isle; on it, ordinary. No Leaf-Fall, no Given Conditions; Struck possible but rare. Their Kind and their table are their own. A Yumboe on the mainland is usually the only one anyone in that town has ever seen. They have no mainland hearth. The storm-wall is the distribution.

Stock ancestries

Daggerheart's stock set — Clank, Drakona, Dwarf, Elf, Faerie, Faun, Firbolg, Fungril, Galapa, Giant, Goblin, Halfling, Human, Infernis, Katari, Orc, Ribbet, Simiah — lives everywhere the Trees do. They are not assigned continents. A few leans keep the map from reading as grey slurry:

- Water-born stock (Ribbet, Galapa, some Seaborne communities) cluster on the same coasts as Selkies, and are not Selkies: Ribbet breathe the deep; Selkies hold their breath and cannot be kept.
- Height-and-wild stock (Giant, some Ridgeborne / Wildborne) show thicker on Heskoren's uplands, beside Tengu ridges, not instead of them.
- Old-wood stock (Elf, Faerie, Fungril, Firbolg) show thicker in Maiethorn's Motherwood, beside Wilds-fox hearths.
- Infernis are born demon-blooded. They are not Bound. The contrast is the point; they are not a Bound-underclass and they have no Bound-homeland.
- Halfling and Faerie are not Yumboe. Small-and-flight and small-and-lucky stay their own lanes; the good people are isle, moon, and unseen hands.

Leans are not rules. A Ribbet judge in inland Threnmaieth is fine. A Giant Lestrane banker is fine. A thicker pocket of one stock in a later town is a town fact, not a racial nation.

Humans are common, not a default the others deviate from. There is no human baseline to marry away from.

Factions recruit by Condition, guild, and faith, not by Kind. A settlement may have a hearth-neighbourhood — a Selkie quay, a Tengu perch, a Rain-Shadow fox-market — without the town being that Kind. Ornsael is the worked example: fox-market by the well, mixed Kinds, no gate. A person gets a Kind, a Condition or Kept, and a place. The place names them.

Kitsune

Kitsune are the fox-born: slight, quick-eyed people with a fox's ears and a brush of tail, and the cold pale light of foxfire — kitsunebi, fox-flame — always a thought away at their fingertips. In folklore the fox is a shapeshifter and a liar. The truth is gentler but real: a Kitsune can throw a glamour — foxfire drawn into the shape of another face, a borrowed voice, a trick of the eye — but it is seeming, not flesh, and it never touches what a person decides, only what they perceive. They are no more dishonest than their neighbours; they simply cannot quite be pinned down. They redirect. They step out of the frame of a situation and leave you looking at where they were, or at a face that isn't theirs. The tail is real and worn openly, and often the surest way to catch a glamoured fox — the one thing the fire won't hide.

Foxfire is the thread that runs through all of them — the ghost-light that leads travelers off the mountain path, the pale fire that hides the sacred white fox, the flame the old nine-tails were said to carry. Each kind of fox bends the same fire a different way.

Not one fox but many. Just as the world holds arctic, desert, and forest foxes, the fox-born come in kinds shaped by the country they were born to — the Fox of the Wilds (red-and-russet, the forest and hedgerow fox), the Fox of the Snows (white-coated, born to the cold north and the high snows), and the Fox of the Sands (pale and huge-eared, born to the deserts and dry country). All are Kitsune, share the same slipperiness and the same foxfire, and marry and mingle freely; a child takes after one parent's line or the other. Each carries a gift bred into it by its home ground, and turns its foxfire to a different old fox-story — the will-o'-wisp that leads a hunter astray, the pale flame that swallows the white fox from sight, the ward-fire of the fox that always knows what's coming.

In a world where three of every four people acquire a Condition, the Kitsune are a Kind defined not by changing but by never quite being where you left them. Their reputation is misdirection-without-deceit — the fox slips the trap; it doesn't lie about the trap being there.

Values

Kitsune prize the graceful exit and the unfought fight — the deal that dissolves before it comes to blows, the door found before the room fills with smoke. They tend to distrust cornered situations (their instinct in a corner is to make a new corner) and to admire cleverness over force. A common fox-born saying: “Never the last one holding it.” They keep their word carefully precisely because, being so slippery, an untrustworthy Kitsune would be trusted by no one — so a Kitsune's given word tends to be very solid, and they know it's their most valuable possession.

Customs

Because they defuse rather than escalate and can never quite be cornered, Kitsune are the world's natural mediators, brokers, and night-couriers: they carry delicate news between rival houses, hold the neutral ground in a negotiation, walk the dark roads by their own cold foxfire, and are trusted to be somewhere unnoticed and gone again without a scene. Foxfire is a small everyday grace, too — children are taught to make it before they're taught to read, and a home with a fox-born in it never wants for a soft, safe light. Older Kitsune, by tradition, carry themselves with more tails in the telling of it (the folklore of nine tails survives as reputation and honorific, not as literal biology or power).

Daggerheart ancestry features

Every Kitsune has Slip the Frame and Fox's Glamour, and chooses one Fox at character creation. The Fox is a full feature — each grants a lasting knack (the real animal's gift, bred in by its home ground) and a foxfire signature move (the fox-spirit myth, each kind turning the same ghost-flame a different way).

- Slip the Frame — When you would take damage from an attack, you can mark a Stress to slip aside: halve the damage, then immediately move up to Very Close range to a position out of the attacker's reach. If you end this movement out of line of sight, you are Hidden.
- Fox's Glamour — You can wrap yourself in foxfire-glamour to seem other than you are: veil your fox features to pass unremarked, cast your voice or a small sound a short way off, or throw a minor sensory illusion (a flicker of movement, a scent, a light) into a space within Close range. Once per scene, you can mark a Stress to wear another face — take on the convincing seeming of another person you've seen, holding it as long as you concentrate. The glamour is illusion, not flesh: it doesn't change your body or fool touch, and a creature that has strong reason to doubt what it's seeing can make an appropriate roll to catch the tell (a fox-shadow, a reflection that's a beat late, an animal's unease). This is disguise and misdirection — never mind-control; it changes what others perceive, not what they decide.
- Your Fox — Choose the fox you were born to. Each has a lasting knack and a foxfire move:
- Fox of the Wilds (red / forest fox — the will-o'-wisp that leads travelers off the path) — Knack: you are at home in tangled, broken, or overgrown country — advantage on Agility Rolls to climb, leap, tumble, or move through difficult terrain, and you ignore its movement penalty. Foxfire — Wisp-Lure: mark a Stress to send dancing ghost-lights and false trails around a creature within Close range; until the end of its next turn it is drawn after the lights — its attacks against anyone but you are made with disadvantage, and you may immediately move up to Very Close range without drawing an attack. It's a lure, not a leash — the target isn't compelled to move, only baited to look the wrong way.

- Fox of the Snows (arctic fox — the sacred white fox that vanishes in its own pale fire) — Knack: you leave no trail worth following — adversaries have disadvantage on rolls to track, trail, or find you, and you have advantage on rolls to Hide or move unseen in open, snowy, pale, or exposed terrain. Foxfire — Cold Vanishing: once per scene, mark a Stress to wrap yourself in cold white foxfire and let the eye slide off you — become Hidden even while observed and in the open, so long as you don't take an action that would obviously reveal you.
- Fox of the Sands (fennec — the many-tailed fox that always knows what's coming) — Knack: you see clearly in darkness and dim light as far as you would in daylight, and your great ears miss nothing — advantage on rolls to hear, notice, or locate hidden creatures, sounds, or movement. Foxfire — Ward-Flame: when you or an ally within Close range would be targeted by an attack, you can mark a Stress to throw up a sudden curtain of foxfire — the target gains a +2 bonus to their Evasion against that attack.

Naming

Hearth-register Kusawe (koo-SAH-way) — light, slipping, sibilant. Daily speech is the local Maiethren drift; the fox-name is what they answer to when someone is trying to pin them down. Given names include Raki, Nenyu, Wishi, Kiraye, Suti, Hatu, Ranyu, Sinro, Foryo, Heka, Sofan.

A Kitsune raised devout in Threnmaieth may still be Raki at home and Raki Maethaem on the roll.

Selkie

Selkies are the sea-born, the skin-kin: sleek, cool-skinned people who carry a second self — a sealskin they can wear or set aside. The skin is not a costume and not a disguise; it is genuinely them, a spare body kept close, and slipping it on or off takes only a moment. Distinct from the frog-folk who simply live underwater, a Selkie's gift is not breathing the deep — it's that you cannot keep hold of one. A Selkie in the water, in a net, in a grip, in a locked room, has a way out; the sea taught them that being held is temporary.

Out of the skin, a Selkie reads as an ordinary person with a few quiet tells — cool, faintly sleek skin, large dark eyes, and sometimes a little webbing at the fingers. Nobody stares; the seal-blood shows the way any other Kind's does. The real transformation lives in the skin, not the face.

The old story is theft and grief — steal a selkie's skin and you own her; she pines for a sea she can't return to. Here the melancholy is the defining strength: a Selkie belongs fully to two homes at once, shore and sea, and so they are the people who move easily between worlds that don't understand each other. The removable skin is a private, tender thing (loaning it, or having it taken, is a real intimacy and a real violation — handled in story, never as a mechanical gotcha), not a leash.

Values

Selkies value belonging without being bound — deep loyalty freely given, resented the instant it's demanded. They are famously hard to detain and famously hard to hold onto: a Selkie loves fiercely but will not be caged, and a relationship or a job that starts to feel like a net is one they will quietly, gracefully leave. They carry a comfortable double-homesickness their whole lives and consider it normal — to always miss the place you aren't is, to them, simply the price of getting to have two homes.

Customs

Because they can't be kept down and can't be kept out, Selkies are the world's rescue swimmers, cold-water divers and salvors, and go-betweens — the ones sent into the surf after the drowning, down to the wreck, or across the water to a community the shore-folk can't talk to. Escape-artistry makes them trusted couriers for anything that mustn't be seized in transit. The sealskin is treated with real ceremony: where a Selkie keeps their skin, who they'd ever let hold it, and the day a child is first given the run of their own skin are all significant, private matters.

Death by drowning is the threshold that Strikes the Far-Voiced. Selkies, being so at home in the water, have a complicated, storied relationship with that door.

Daggerheart ancestry features

- Second Skin — You carry a sealskin, a second self you can don or shed in a moment. While you wear it, you ignore the effects of cold and deep water, you can hold your breath far longer than anyone should, and you always know which way is up and where the nearest surface or shore lies. You have advantage on Agility Rolls to swim, dive, or move through water.
- Anchored. Your skin is your fixed point in the world. Wherever you leave it stashed, you always know the direction and distance to it and can find your way back to it unerringly, however far you've travelled or however turned-around you are. (Loaning your skin, or having it taken, is a matter of story and trust — never a mechanical penalty.)
- Slip the Hold — When a creature grabs or restrains you, or succeeds on an attack against you, you can mark a Stress to slip free like a seal from a net: you end any grab or Restrained effect on you, ignore any forced movement from that attack, and move up to Very Close range out of the creature's reach.

- Seal-Kin — Seals and the beasts of the sea treat you as kin, not as prey or stranger. You have advantage on rolls to calm, read, or call an animal of the sea. Once per scene, while you are in or near water, you can mark a Stress to let the sea itself warn you: until the end of your next turn you cannot be caught off guard by anything approaching through the water, and the nearest seal-kin surface to aid you — a distraction that draws a foe’s attention, a tow through the current, or a shove that carries you toward shore or safety.

Selkies are at home in water (long breath-hold, ignore cold and deep, swim advantage) but are not true underwater breathers — that stays the Ribbet’s lane. Seal-Kin calls seal-kin to aid; it does not charm people.

Naming

Hearth-register Sakoa (sah-KOH-ah) — liquid, rounded, coastal. Daily speech is the local Maiethren drift. Given names include Lavo, Fesa, Moka, Dovo, Neson, Foaro, Veakea, Didel, Roadoa, Woanun, Laknea.

The hearth-name is spoken to the water the day a child is first given the run of their skin; the civic byname comes from the town that watched them Turn. Two homes, two names; they do not consider this a conflict.

Tengu

Tengu are the crow-born of the high country: lean, sharp-featured people with dark feathers through their hair and down their arms, black bright eyes, and broad wings that carry them off any cliff or updraft. They are the folk of the peaks and the wind — born where the air is thin and the weather turns in a heartbeat, and utterly unbothered by either. Where lowlanders see a killing drop and a coming storm, a Tengu reads a launch point and a rising thermal. They fly, yes — but the deeper truth of a Tengu is that the mountain never surprises them. They feel the rockfall before it slides and the squall before it breaks.

They are neither aloof trickster-demons nor swordsmanship-obsessed hermits. They are the people who belong to the high wild the way Selkies belong to the sea: at home in the exact place that kills everyone else. The fox-born move unseen through society, the sea-born move freely through water, and the crow-born move freely through the sky and the heights.

Wings are always present. A Tengu reads as Tengu at a glance, as ordinary in-world as any other Kind.

Values

Tengu prize perspective — literally and otherwise. Their instinct in any tangle is to get above it and look down: gain height, gain distance, see the whole shape of a thing before acting. They tend toward blunt directness (from people used to seeing exactly where a path leads and saying so) and a certain impatience with those who won't climb to look for themselves. A crow-born saying: "The valley argues about the storm; the ridge just watches it come." They respect earned skill and hard-won height, and have little patience for status that wasn't climbed to.

Customs

Because they can go where footpaths can't and read the mountain's mood before it turns, Tengu are the world's high-pass guides, weather-callers, sky-couriers, and mountain rescue — the ones who carry word over the peaks faster than any road, who call the avalanche warning down to the valley towns, and who go over the edge after the fallen climber. Tengu settlements cling to cliff faces and ridge-shelves, reached by wing or by rope, and a Tengu's first solo flight off the home crag is as significant a coming-of-age as a Selkie child first given the run of their own skin. They keep a running, half-teasing rivalry with the Selkies — sky-folk and sea-folk each convinced their element is the one worth belonging to.

Daggerheart ancestry features

- Wind-Winged — You can fly. While flying, you can mark a Stress to fold your wings and dive on a target within Close range: treat it as a Finesse attack dealing d8 physical damage using your Proficiency, and end the dive anywhere within Very Close range of that target.
- The Mountain's Mood — You read the high wild before it moves. You have advantage on rolls to sense danger in the natural world (a coming storm, rockfall, avalanche, unstable footing, treacherous terrain) and to navigate mountainous or aerial ground. You cannot be caught off guard by an environmental hazard or a terrain-based ambush — you always feel it coming in time to act or call a warning before it lands.
- Wind-Caller — You command the mountain wind the way the old fan-bearers did. Mark a Stress to call a sudden gust and choose one: shove a target within Far range a step closer or farther and knock it Vulnerable; carry yourself or a willing ally an extra move on the wind (a great leap, a saving glide down from a height, a boost across a gap); or sweep an area within Close range clear of smoke, gas, fog, or loose airborne projectiles until the start of your next turn.

Naming

Hearth-register Gonan (GO-nan) — clipped, windy, high-country. Deliberately not the same mouth as Kusawe. Daily speech is the local Maiethren drift. Given names include Teku, Kukra, Gobak, Hosen, Kotak, Buka, Rekren, Kuhos, Hrarat, Gonan. (Gonan is also the people-name; reuse as a given name is a hearth-honor, like naming a child after the ridge.)

Bynames are often a perch or a pass — Teku of Highgate, Hosen of the White Stair — not a harbour.

Yumboe

Yumboes are the good people — Bakhna Rakhna in their own tongue — the small, moon-waked hill-folk of the far isle of Kumbaan. They stand about waist-high to a mainlander, with pearl-pale skin that catches the light, hair like spun silver, and wide dark eyes made for the night. They live within the green hills of their home — a warren of hearths and long feast-halls hollowed under the turf — and come up by moonlight, for they keep the night the way other folk keep the day. And they are famously, defiantly hospitable: a Yumboe's table is open to native and stranger alike, laid with more than a small people should be able to carry, and waited on by hands and feet you can plainly see and bodies you cannot — the unseen servants that are the good people's oldest wonder.

Unlike Kitsune, Selkie, and Tengu — native to the mainland and unremarkable there — a Yumboe is mythic-rare off their far isle. Most people of Maiethorn, Strandoren, and Heskoren have only heard stories of the pearly, silver-haired good people from across the drowning sea.

They are neither a twee paradise nor a hidden menace. They are an ordinary, warm, whole people who happen to live somewhere almost no one can reach, so their strangeness is entirely a matter of distance, not nature. They are not strange to themselves; they are only a legend to a world that has never had them to supper. A small, generous hill-people who love a feast and the moon; underneath, the hands with no bodies, and a whole living nation the mainland files under fairy-tale.

A Yumboe reads as a Yumboe at a glance, which is exactly why they can't move unremarked off their isle. The "two-foot good people" of the oldest tellings are the deep-hill kin of legend; those you would play are small but not doll-sized.

Values

Yumboes prize hospitality above nearly all else — to feed a guest, and to be fed as one, is their deepest courtesy and their firmest bond; a shared table is as binding to them as a sworn word is to the Bound. They are a people of the threshold and the hearth: comfortable underground and after dark, unhurried, and quietly certain that the surface world's noon-day bustle misses most of what matters. Because they are small and their home is hidden, they have never learned to meet force with force — they meet it with welcome, with misdirection, and with a great many helping hands. A Yumboe saying: “No one is a stranger twice.” They find the mainland's daylight faiths loud and its treatment of the unwelcomed baffling.

Customs

On Kumba, life runs by the moon: the good people wake at dusk, work and feast and dance the bright nights, and sleep out the glare of day in the cool of the hills. Their halls are famous (in their own telling) for feasts that outshine their means — the unseen hands fetch and pour and serve, so that even a poor household sets a table like a lord's. They keep terrace-gardens and standing-stone marks on the surface and the real life below; they fish the storm-walled shallows and, the old accounts say, were not above lifting a little corn from anyone careless enough to leave it — a small people's small mischief, told fondly.

Off the isle — the very few who cross — a Yumboe is a walking wonder, and knows it. They tend to become hosts, keepers, cooks, and go-betweens wherever they land, turning the one thing they always have (a welcome, and hands to lay a table) into a place in a world that first meets them as a myth. A Yumboe abroad is usually the only one anyone has ever seen.

Kumba has no Turning Tree. There is no Leaf-Fall and no Given Conditions on the isle. Struck can still happen, at far smaller percentages than the mainland — enough for a story, not a social class. Being a Kind, Yumboe still stacks with a Condition in principle. A Yumboe abroad under a mainland Tree is a live question (she could Give; it almost never arises), not a racial immunity.

Daggerheart ancestry features

Every Yumboe has all three: Hollow-Hill, Moon-Waked, and The Unseen Hands.

- Hollow-Hill — You are one of the good people: small (hill-folk stature), and born to the deep earth. You can move through gaps and spaces too tight for a larger creature, and you have advantage on Agility Rolls to squeeze, climb, or move through cramped, broken, or underground terrain and to Hide where there is cover to slip behind. Underground, or within stone and hill, you always know your depth and heading and cannot become lost, and you feel movement through the ground — you cannot be caught off guard by a creature moving toward you across or beneath the earth.
- Moon-Waked — You keep the night. You see in darkness and dim light as clearly as others see by day, and you have advantage on rolls to notice, search, or act at night or underground — anywhere the sun doesn't reach. When you take rest under the open night sky or moonlight, you clear 1 additional Stress (or your party gains a little of the good people’s ease — GM’s call on the fiction). The daylight doesn’t harm you, but you are never quite at your best in its glare.

- The Unseen Hands — You can call the good people’s unseen servants — hands and feet plainly visible, but no body between them — to attend you. At will, they perform small tasks within Close range: fetch and carry a light object, pour and serve, hold a door or a rope, steady a load, lay a table. Once per scene, you can mark a Stress to set them to harry instead: a flurry of unseen hands swarms a target within Close range, and until the end of its next turn choose one — the target has disadvantage on its next attack, or the next ally to act against it has advantage. The hands are a conjured seeming of many small helpers, not a force — they can distract, fumble, and fetch, but they can’t deal damage, wield a weapon, or restrain a determined creature.

Naming

The Yumboes speak their own tongue, unrelated to Maiethren — the one language in the setting that owes nothing to the Leaf-Mother’s liturgy, because the Trees never crossed the storm-wall. Its sound is open-voweled and warm, with soft pre-nasal clusters (mb, nd, nk, nj) and a lilting, drum-like rhythm. A Yumboe name sounds foreign the instant it’s spoken.

- Their name for themselves: Bakhna Rakhna — “the good people.”
- Their homeland: Kumbaan (koom-BAHN) — “the hidden home.” Mainlanders call it the Sundering Isle.
- Given names include Ambaa, Njeela, Kumbo, Sambanka, Ndeya, Mbaraan, Njunda, Rakhilo, Sonkaa, Mbindaa, Yumbaka, Ndoolu, Sambiyo, Lunji, Yaaba, Saalo, Mbela, Soonke, Njili, Yendo, Waandi, Koriwaa.

Yumboes are too rare on the mainland to have grown a local byname-layer. They keep the one register.

Naming People

A person is named by the place that raised them. A custom Kind may also keep a hearth-name.

Stock ancestries have no private tongue. The four custom Kinds do — a register for given names, kin-names, and in-group talk — and they still wear the local Maiethren drift on the street. You can often hear both homes in one introduction.

The two-name pattern

Most people have:

1. A given name — chosen by family. Custom-Kind families often draw this from the hearth-register. Everyone else draws from the local Maiethren drift.
2. A byname — not a modern surname. You are of a town, of a Tree, of a house, called such for a deed, or (in Threnmaieth) named on the Threnhael. Bynames follow the place, always.

So a fox-born broker on the Ledger Coast might be Raki of Hallowquay — hearth-given, Strand-byname. A human neighbour at the same desk might be Valen of Hallowquay. Same street; different first sound; same civic name.

Yumboes are the exception: they are too rare on the mainland to have grown a local byname-layer. They keep the one register. That is why a Yumboe introduction sounds foreign the instant it's spoken.

Two names is a Kind × place tell, not a secret identity. You hear it in ordinary introductions.

The common-tongue person-register

Everyday names are worn Old Tongue: liquids, nasals, soft th, long vowels. Push them through the three drifts the same way institution-names are pushed. Stress usually falls on the second syllable, as in the Old Tongue (CAPS marks stress on first use).

This is the person-language of the Tree-touched world. Do not invent a fourth “human language.” A named power uses the same roots and the right drift; it does not get a new mouth unless it refused the Tree. Vaelhesk keeps older vael and frontier hesk-. Kumbaen already has its own register.

Drift	Place	What happens to a person-name	Examples
Conservative	Threnmaieth, pious Maiethorn	th and long vowels kept	Maethaem (MY-eth-aym), Reimaethe (ray-MY-eth-eh), Thilim (THIL-im), Rithnali (rith-NAH-lee), Valein (vah-LAYN)
Worn	Vaethorn, Heskoren folk-speech	th softens; endings simplify	Nathdo (NATH-doh), Saelid (SAY-lid), Tora , Seine (SAY-neh), Nethiro (neth-EE-ro)
Eroded	Lestrand, Strandoren docks	th → t/d or drops; clipped	Valen , Tilim , Mataero (mah-TAY-ro), Ledan , Sorel

The four hearth-registers

Each custom Kind's register is a naming-language: phonology, syllable shape, and a working list. Not a grammar. The common-tongue names — Kitsune, Selkie, Tengu, Yumboe — are what outsiders say.

Kitsune — Kusawe (koo-SAH-way). Light, slipping, a little sibilant — a mouth that leaves a corner in the sentence.

Consonants	k s sh n r m t w y f h
Vowels	a i u e o ai
Syllables	CV · CVF (F = n/m/r) · 2–3 syllables
Does not use	th (Maiethren sacred), prenasals mb/nd/nj (Yumboe), kr/gr (Tengu)

Given names: Raki, Nenyu, Wishi, Kiraye, Suti, Hatu, Ranyu, Sinro, Foryo, Heka, Sofan.

The hearth-name is the one they answer to when someone is trying to pin them down; they consider this funny.

Selkie — Sakoa (sah-KOH-ah). Liquid, rounded, coastal — names you can say with cold air in your mouth.

Consonants	l r n m s v f d b k w
Vowels	o u a ea oa i e
Syllables	CV · CVC · 2–3 syllables
Does not use	th, sh, kr/gr , prenasals

Given names: Lavo, Fesa, Moka, Dovo, Neson, Foaro, Veakea, Didel, Roadoa, Woanun, Laknea.

The day a child is first given the run of their own skin is when the hearth-name is spoken to the water. The civic byname comes later, from the town that watched them Turn.

Tengu — Gonan (GO-nan). Clipped, windy, high-country — shorter names, hard onsets, said as if the wind might take the end. Ridge-speech, not court-speech. Not the same mouth as Kusawe.

Consonants	k t g n r h s b d · onsets kr gr hr
Vowels	a o u e (few i — that vowel lives in Kusawe)
Syllables	CVC · CV · 1–3 syllables, prefer 2
Does not use	th, sh, prenasals, long ai/ea/oa diphthongs

Given names: Teku, Kukra, Gobak, Hosen, Kotak, Buka, Rekren, Kuhos, Hrarat, Gonan.

A Tengu byname is often a perch or a pass, not a harbour.

Yumboe. Full register as above: open vowels, pre-nasal mb nd nk nj, own-name Bakhna Rakhna, homeland Kumbaan. They keep a single register on the mainland.

Collision and reserved names

Initial and cadence should keep a cast distinct: do not seat Raki and Ranyu in the same party; do not seat Teku and Kukra as twins unless they are.

Register bleed is a tell. A Selkie named Wishi or a Tengu named Maethaem means raised away, adopted, or passing. Use it on purpose or not at all.

Locked place-names are reserved. No person is called Vaethorn, Lestrand, Threnmaieth, Thaeloren, Maieth, Kumbaan, Ndeyaan, Haelthael, Leddoren, or Vaeloren. Clergy and house coinages stay off the person-list too: Orenhael, Thaelvaeth, Nethoren, Leddhael, Vaelbren, Njaalo, Njawaal, Vaethledd. So do the squares Ornsael, Brenthael, Brenod, Vaelun, Ornath, Harrow's, and the seats Eolvaeth, Orentel, Maiethlir.

A byname comes from the place, not from the Kind.

The Old Tongue

The root language of the Turning is the old liturgical tongue of the Awakening Tree, in which the Motherfaith says its rites. Every place-name, institution, and polity-name in the setting derives from it. In-world it is called Maiethren (mah-YETH-ren, “Mother-speech”) by the devout, or just the Old Tongue by everyone else. It is this world's Latin: nobody's mother-tongue on the street anymore, but the ancestor of every tongue that is, and still the language of the Tree, the rite, and the law's oldest words.

One root tongue, three daughter drifts — the same shape as the world itself. One Awakening Tree, grafts carried outward; one sacred tongue, vernaculars drifting outward. Because a daughter tongue drifts further the further it is from the conserving pull of the Trees and the faith, how a polity sounds reveals its stance: the core keeps the old sacred sound nearly whole, the frontier wears it rougher, the secular coast erodes it smooth.

Pronunciation

Warm and weighty — a hall-and-hearth tongue with a thread of solemn, archaic gravity. Liquids and nasals carry the warmth; thorn (th) and long vowels carry the weight; no harsh consonant clusters, so it stays sayable.

Consonants: m n · l r w j · p t k · b d g · f v s h · þ (th, as in thin). No harsh clusters; th is the signature sacred sound (it is the first consonant to erode away in the secular daughters).

Vowels: a e i o u, plus the digraphs ae, ei, eo.

Pronunciation key (used on every coined name):

- CAPS = the stressed syllable.
- ae = “ay” (as in day) · ei = “eye” · eo = an “ay-oh” glide · a = father · e = bed · i = machine · o = go · u = moon.
- th = soft “th” as in thin (never as in the).
- Stress usually falls on the second syllable of a two- or three-syllable word (thae-LOR-en, ma-YETH), though short compounds stress the root.

Sacred lexicon

Meanings are the root senses; the daughters warp both sound and shade.

Root	Says	Meaning	Note
oren	OR-en	to witness; to speak true	The heart-word of the setting — citizenship is witnessed, and to witness is to speak truly.
ren	ren	speech, tongue	As a suffix, “the speech of —” (Maieth- ren = Mother-speech).
thael	thayl	the Tree; sacred motherwood	The Turning Tree itself.
maieth	MY-eth	the Mother	The Leaf-Mother.
vael	vayl	gift; older : what the land yields	A Condition Given — a blessing handed down. The Old Ways claim this is a narrowing; the frontier still uses vael for harvest, a child returned from water, a person the hill kept.
vaeth	vayth	the waiting; the longing	The state of awaiting a gift (the Kept; the pilgrim’s longing).
hael	hayl	whole, hale, sound	Untithed wholeness / health / being kept-whole.
thren	thren	to count, to tally, to number	Sacred counting — stewardship, accounting-before-the-Mother. (Contrast ledd .)
ledd	led	to reckon, to account	Commercial counting — the ledger, the sum. The secular twin of thren .
orn	orn	land, ground, holding	A held or settled land.
neth	neth	night; the long dark	Month-root — Nethael, Nethorn.
eol	AY-ohl	a hinge; the year’s turning	Month-root — Eolthael, the High-Solstice month. Also the liturgical name of the First Cut: Eoloren .
bren	bren	hearth; the kept fire	Month-root — Brenorn.
lir	leer	thaw; water that runs again	Month-root — Liren.
sael	sayl	sowing; the first green	Month-root — Saelorn. Distinct from vael (a gift Given) and hael (wholeness). Also the greens-keepers’ root.

Root	Says	Meaning	Note
ael	ayl	to air; to let feeling out	The Far-Voiced outlet — the ael-hall . Distinct from sael (sowing) and hael (wholeness).
stel	stel	to still; to hold from moving	The Stilled’s craft.
crae	kray	craft; the working of an element	The Answered shops as a sector.
hesk	hesk	far/outer edge	Frontier coinage, not in the old liturgy (the liturgy is older than this grafting). Heskoren, Vaelhesk.

A name that carries the whole setting: the Awakening Tree’s own liturgical name is Thaeloren (thae-LOR-en) — thael (Tree) + oren (to witness): “the Tree that witnesses.” The world’s entire citizenship-by-witness system is folded into the name of the Tree itself. Everyday worn form: “the Thallow.”

One root, three daughter drifts

Each daughter is the Old Tongue eroded by distance from the Trees and the faith. The sound-changes are regular, so any Old-Tongue word can be pushed through them.

Drift	Polity	Sound-changes from the root	Feel
Conservative	Threnmaieth (the pious core)	Almost none — th and long vowels kept whole; the sacred sound conserved as daily speech.	Archaic, formal, holy. Sounds like the liturgy because it barely moved from it.
Worn	Vaethorn (the devout frontier)	th revered but softening in common speech (Vaethorn → “Wethorn”); endings simplify; vowels flatten.	Rough-warm folk-speech that still reaches for the old holy words.
Eroded	Lestrand (the secular coast)	th → t/d and often dropped; long vowels clipped; word-ends worn off; trade-contact loans.	Smooth, clipped, mercantile. The most-drifted sound = the least-devout polity.

The most-drifted name belongs to the least-devout place.

Vaethorn (vay-THORN) — vaeth (the waiting) + orn (land) = “the Waiting Land.” The devout frontier keeps the sacred th; the longing-for-a-gift-that-may-not-fall is in the name itself. Everyday worn form “Wethorn”; people Vaethorn-folk, or the Waiting.

Lestrand (leh-STRAND) — ledd (to reckon) + strand (shore), eroded smooth = “the Reckoning Coast.” It is the most-drifted name of the original three, and that is the point: the faith wore off the docks, and so did the thorn. People Lestrand-folk or Strandmen.

Threnmaieth (THREN-my-eth) — thren (sacred counting) + maieth (the Mother) = “the Mother’s Reckoning.” The pious core keeps the full sacred sound, and names its census outright as reverent stewardship of Her gifts. People Threnmaieth-folk; the crown styles itself the Mother’s Reckoning.

The same lever holds further out: thren worn to Tren in Trenledd; maieth as gift not count in Maiethvael; vael vs vaeth on Heskoren (Vaelhesk / Vaethorn). Kumbaan is not on this list.

The common tongue — the plainspoken trade-vernacular most people actually speak — is the worn-down middle everyone shares. Its words are the plain compounds already used across the world (the Kept, venting-hall), understood as worn Old-Tongue rather than a separate language.

Faiths are coined from the same roots, so a faith sounds like the land that keeps it:

- Haelthael (hayl-THALE) — hael + thael = “the Tree kept whole.” The Watching’s own name: the Tree before it was given a mother’s name.
- Leddoren (led-OR-en) — ledd + oren = “the witnessed account.” The Fair Hand’s own name: the Tree as a signing-table.
- Vaeloren (vay-LOR-en) — vael + oren in the older sense = “the land’s witnessing.” The Old Ways’ liturgical name.
- Ndeyaan (ndey-AHN) — not Maiethren; the Yumboe night-keeping. The Open Table’s own name. The one faith-name that owes the liturgy nothing.

Clergy, guild, and era names are built from the same lexicon (Orenhael, Thaelvaeth, Nethoren, Leddhael, Vaelbren, Njaalo, Njawaal, Vaethledd, Saelhael, Aeloren, Stelhael, the Crae; Brenvaeth, Eoloren, Ornthael). Their stance-variants live in the institution dictionary below.

Naming Institutions

The name a polity gives a shared thing reveals its stance.

Every polity has the same institutions (they flow from the Trees and the Conditions, which are universal). But what each calls them is set by where it sits on the theology / reach / governance axes. A devout land calls the release-hall a gift-hall; a merchant coast calls it a release-house; a surveillance-crown calls it a counted hall. Same building, three worldviews.

Sacred and old things keep their Old-Tongue shape; everyday things wear it down. Three daughter drifts carry the stance in the sound itself: the pious core (Threnmaieth) conserves the sacred sound; the devout frontier (Vaethorn) wears it rougher; the secular coast (Lestrand) erodes it smooth (the th drops, ends clip).

Citizenship & law

Thing	Common tongue	Vaethorn (devout)	Lestrand (secular)	Threnmaieth (surveillance)
proof-by-people (vouching)	standing-for	the speaking (vouched at worship)	warranting (a commercial guarantee)	the naming (you are named to the crown)
the safety-licence	the ticket	the blessing-to-practice	the guild-ticket	the crown-warrant
a census of persons	(none — no one else keeps one)	(none — the giving is the Mother's to know)	the roll (a tax roll only, never of persons)	the Threnhael (THREN-hayl, “the whole-keeping”)
the Inviolable Will	“the will is one's own”	the Mother's own line (held as scripture)	the free-will clause (sound commercial law)	the crown's assurance (cited to justify the roll)

Threnmaieth's census calls itself the Threnhael — thren (sacred counting) + hael (whole, hale): “the keeping-whole.” It sounds like care (keeping every subject hale), and is total surveillance. Its own clerks say they “keep the realm hale”; its subjects are “kept whole”; outsiders hear “the Counting.” The name is sanctified-surveillance in a single word.

Tithe-provision

Thing	Common tongue	Vaethorn (devout)	Lestrand (secular)	Threnmaieth (surveillance)

The people

The three life-outcomes of the Leaf-Fall keep their plain common-tongue names everywhere — the Given, the Struck, the Kept are universal. But each polity’s second word for them betrays how it feels:

Common tongue	Vaethorn (devout)	Lestrand (secular)	Threnmaieth (surveillance)
the Given (a Condition Given)	the gifted (blessed)	the Given (plain)	the marked (on the roll)
the Struck (turned later, alone)	the late-come (met at a later door)	the turned (neutral, a fact)	the unwitnessed (suspect until named)
the Kept (untithed, whole)	the Waited / Mother-kept (pitied — passed over)	the free (approving — unencumbered labor)	the unmarked / the passed-over (noted as such)

Read across a single row and you have the whole setting. The Kept are pitied in devout Vaethorn (they “missed the gift”), envied-as-free on mercantile Lestrand (no Tithe, no guild, go anywhere), and filed as unmarked in Threnmaieth (a gap in the roll to be explained). One kind of person; three societies’ worth of judgment.

Clergy

Thing	Common tongue	Vaethorn (devout)	Lestrand (secular)	Threnmaieth (surveillance)
the Motherfaith’s working clergy	tree-wardens (liturg. Orenhael)	Hands-folk	tree-tenders	the Reckoned Hands
the pilgrimage college	the First Seat	the First Hand’s college	the old seat (a civic bureau)	the Reckoned Seat (wants them on the roll)

Liturgical senses, for the houses that have them: Orenhael (or-EN-hayl) — oren + hael = “the witnessing-whole” (they speak the fall truly and keep the Tree hale). Thaelvaeth (THALE-vayth) — thael + vaeth = “the Tree gone to the waiting.” Nethoren (neth-OR-en) — neth + oren = “the night-witnesses.” Leddhael (LED-hayl) — ledd + hael = “the accounted-whole.” Vaelbren (VAYL-bren) — vael (older: land’s yield) + bren = “the yield-hearth.” Njaalo (NJAH-lo) — not Maiethren; a Yumboe coinage, “the hall that is kept.” Njawaal (njah-WAHL) — not Maiethren; the Shore-Sitters. Vaethledd (VAYTH-led) — vaeth + ledd = “the waiting reckoned.”

The Intake has no liturgical name.

Faiths

The Tree and the Faiths

The Turning Tree

A Turning Tree is a broad, slow, long-lived hardwood — canopy like a great oak or beech, but its own kind — that stands at the ceremonial heart of a town, usually in a square, a green, or a walled temple-yard kept for it. Out of season it looks like an unusually grand old tree and townsfolk treat it as one: children climb the low boughs, courts and markets convene in its shade, lovers carve nothing into it (that's taboo). In the tenth-year solstice week it turns — the canopy shifts through colours no ordinary tree wears, and it chooses.

The everyday word is Turning Tree (for what it does at the solstice: it turns, and it turns children into what they'll become). The devout call each one a Hand of the Mother, and the reverent species-word in liturgy is motherwood. In the old liturgical tongue the Tree is Thaeloren (thae-LOR-en) — thael (Tree) + oren (to witness), “the Tree that witnesses.” Everyday worn form: the Thallow.

The Awakening Tree

There is one origin Tree: the Awakening Tree — the great, first Tree, the pilgrimage heart of the world. Old beyond reliable dating, vast, and the one Tree no one grafted from another — every other Turning Tree descends from it. In liturgy it is the First Hand. It is a genuine pilgrimage destination: devout families make the journey to be Turned under the origin; some settle nearby; the faith's central clergy seat sits in its shadow — the First Seat, a college of tree-wardens, not a throne. It stands on Maiethorn, in the Sacred Core.

Grafts

Every town Turning Tree is a living graft of the Awakening Tree. As towns take root — especially far-flung ones a family could never reach the origin from — a sapling grafted from the Awakening Tree is carried out and planted in the new town's square. A scion is not a seedling grown from a fallen seed; it is cut tissue of the one Tree, kept alive on the road and married into new ground.

This gives the world both at once. Everyday families walk to their town's Tree for the Leaf-Fall — the divine is local, no one is exiled from the rite by distance. That is the Hands-era default. It was not always so. The truly faithful travel to the Awakening Tree itself, the first Hand, to have a child Turned there or simply to stand under the origin. On Heskoren, and wherever a graft has failed, the walk is still necessity, not only devotion.

The faithful hold that because every scion is continuous tissue of the one Tree, “the Turning Trees are her hands” is literally true: when any town’s Tree chooses, it is the one power choosing through a grafted hand. Skeptics grant the grafting — it is observable horticulture — while denying the conclusion, that a mind chooses through it.

A graft is a rite, not just horticulture. Cutting a scion from the Awakening Tree (or, in practice, from an established healthy town Tree acting on the origin’s behalf) is done by the tree-wardens; the cutting is carried in living earth and planted with ceremony. How that rite was captured — a heresy, then a paper — is the First Cut.

A young Tree can’t yet Turn. A freshly planted scion takes years — a generation, by common reckoning — to mature enough to hold a Leaf-Fall. New towns lean on a neighbour’s Tree in the meantime (children travel to the nearest turning town): rivalries, road-customs, “we Turned at Harrow’s Tree before we had our own.”

When Trees sicken and die

They are mortal wood, not indestructible. A blighted or dying Tree is a genuine civic crisis — a town may lose its ability to Turn its own children and fall back on pilgrimage or a neighbour. A dead Tree is replaced only by a fresh graft and the long wait. A mature Tree is hard to move once planted; the practice is to graft a new scion rather than transplant.

A town without a Tree is the natural frontier condition — too new, too remote, or Tree-bereaved. Such places send their ten-year-olds on the road to Turn, which marks them as edge-of-the-map.

The Leaf-Fall

The rite the whole world is built around. Held in Turning-Week, the week bracketing the High Solstice of midsummer, when the Trees hold their colour and the choosing is done.

Every child who turns ten since the last solstice is brought by family; the town gathers as witness; a tree-warden officiates (the town hearth; the First Seat is only a pilgrimage-week presence). It is simultaneously a sacred rite and the town’s biggest festival of the year — part christening, part graduation, part fair.

Children come to the Tree one at a time (or in the small cohort of a given year), stand within the canopy’s reach, and wait. The Tree turns and lets fall what it will. The rest of the town watches from the edge of the boughs.

Two outcomes:

- A colour falls → a Condition is Given. One or more leaves of a telling colour drift down and settle on the child. The colour names the Condition. This is expected, “proper,” celebrated — the child grows up already knowing what they’ll become, and is trained and guided toward it.
- The leaves hug, no colour → the child is Kept. Instead of a coloured fall, the ordinary leaves gather and wrap the child — a green embrace, no naming colour. This marks one of the Kept: kept whole, wanted in their own right. The faith holds this on belief as a chosen kindness, not a failure or an oversight, and the schism argues over it.

The feel of the hour is a held breath, a whole town watching a single child, a parent who was themselves Given the same colour weeping when it falls again — or a parent who quietly hoped for the hug. The Leaf-Fall itself is warm, weighty, and communal. Dread lives in the Tithes, not in the rite.

Reading the colours

The colour that falls tells the town which Condition has been Given.

The core colour-meanings are folk-known — an ordinary townspeople can read the obvious ones (everyone knows what the deep-red Long-Lived leaf or the storm-grey Two-Bodied fall looks like). The tree-wardens hold the authoritative reading, confirm it aloud at the ceremony, and handle the rare, subtle, or mixed falls (a colour few have seen; a fall that could be read two ways). This gives the faith a real, needed civic function beyond doctrine — a reason society organizes around the Tree, not just prays at it.

The Given-only Conditions have clear, well-known colours (they’re only ever seen at the Tree). The Struck-capable Conditions — Far-Voiced, the Stilled, the Taken-In — can fall as colours too, which is why a Given Far-Voiced and a Struck Far-Voiced share a nature but not a story.

Leaf-colour	Condition	Who can read it
deep red / wine	Long-Lived	folk-known (already proverbial)
storm-grey	Two-Bodied	folk-known (already proverbial)
lamp-amber / brass	the Answered	folk-known sea-blue	Far-Voiced	folk-known (a Given blue-leaf child is trained; a Struck Far-Voiced has no leaf at all)
pale stone / marble-white	the Stilled	folk-known, and feared — the warden says it carefully copper-green / verdigris	the Taken-In	folk-known if you know not to confuse it with the hug — this green is wrong , metallic, not the Tree's own white-fire / opal	Phoenix	clergy-known from texts. Almost no living town has seen it fall. A warden who names it at a ceremony has just made history (and a problem).

The Tree never Strikes, so Returned and Bound have no colour (and the Unbound has none — it chains off Bound). The Kept hug is ordinary summer-green, no naming colour — that is why the Taken-In leaf must not be ordinary green.

Rare, mixed, or argumentative falls (two colours; a colour no one present has seen; a Phoenix-reading someone wants to be wrong) are why the tree-wardens exist as a civic office, not only a devout one.

A Tree never Strikes. The Tree only Gives or Keeps. The Struck — Conditions that arrive through a later threshold, a drowning, an oath, a death survived — happen away from the Tree, with no leaf and no ceremony. The faith's reading of the Struck — whether they're still the Mother's doing — is exactly the live schism.

The Leaf-Mother

Some hold that the Leaf-Mother blessed the world with the Conditions, and that the Turning Trees are her hands reaching down to choose — each Leaf-Fall an act of a mother's love. This is a belief held by many, not confirmed cosmology: skeptics are sincere and full members of society, and the faith itself is built to make room for them. Everyday: the Motherfaith. Their own name: Maieth.

A gift-religion

No one is being rescued from a fallen state. The founding fact is that the world received gifts (the Conditions) and goes on receiving them each solstice. The faith is a long answer to how do you live worthy of a gift?

Orthopraxy over orthodoxy. What makes you of the Motherfaith is what you do — you bring your children to the Tree, you tend your Tithe honestly, you keep the festival — far more than what you privately believe about who does the choosing. This is the structural reason a devout believer and a quiet skeptic can stand at the same Leaf-Fall and both belong. Right practice binds; right belief is argued about.

Divine character: a mother. Benevolent, attentive, generous, and quiet — she does not thunder, command, or demand worship. She gives, and (the faithful say) she watches. The maternal frame is the whole tone: you don't fear the Mother, you try not to waste what she hands you.

The Motherfaith is the dominant faith of the Turning lands but not the only religion. The Leaf-Mother is not written as the universe's sole power; she is this people's Mother.

Doctrine (as the faithful hold it)

The Giving. In the beginning (the faithful say) the world was only ever born into — people were their Kind and nothing more. The Leaf-Mother's gift was becoming: the capacity to be given something beyond your birth, a Condition the world would need. The first Tree, the Awakening Tree, is where she first reached down; every town Tree is a grafted Hand of the Mother, so that no child is too far from her reach.

She chooses, and she chooses well. Doctrine holds that the colour a child receives is chosen — looked-at, intended, fitted to the child and to the town's need. The gifts “fit too well” to be accident (believers point to this; skeptics call it hindsight).

The Tithe is the weight of a gift, not a punishment. Every Condition costs upkeep. The faith reads this as honest weight: a real gift has a real charge to carry, and tending it well is the ordinary devotion of a lifetime. “Tend what you're given” is the closest thing the faith has to a first commandment.

The Kept are given wholeness. To be Kept — hugged by the leaves, no colour — is doctrinally a gift of being left whole, not an oversight. This is where the schism bites hardest.

She has no throne to visit and no voice that answers on demand. Accessibility is mediated and quiet: she is met at the Tree, in the turning of a life, in the fittingness of things — never summoned. This quietness is doctrinally intended (a mother lets her children live), and is exactly what leaves room for honest doubt.

Practice

- The Leaf-Fall — the central rite, a child's tenth-year solstice Turning. It is at once sacrament, coming-of-age, and the town's great festival.
- The Tending — the ongoing, private devotion of paying your Tithe well. Framed religiously: to tend your Condition honestly is to honour the gift. A Two-Bodied who runs their other self, a Long-Lived who keeps their vigils — the faith calls this worship-by-living, not just upkeep.
- The Turning-week festival — the solstice week around the Leaf-Falls: markets, feasts, the reunion of families, the naming of the year's new Given and new Kept. The emotional high point of the calendar.
- Threshold rites for the Struck — because the Struck receive a Condition away from the Tree, the faith has grown quiet rites to receive them back: a Struck person is brought to the Tree after the fact, not to be Turned (the Tree doesn't Strike) but to be acknowledged — folded into the community of the Given rather than left as an anomaly. How warmly this is done is itself contested.
- Tree-tending — the civic-sacred care of the town's Turning Tree (watering rites, warding against blight, the graft-rites when a new scion is planted). Handled by the tree-wardens.

Towns house the warden-hearth; Turning-Week is the festival share; Cutting-leave carries a fee framed as carrying-earth; pilgrimage keeps the Seat. The tree-wardens are not the Tithe-infrastructure sector.

The live schism

The faith is not monolithic. Its central argument is a genuine, good-faith one that no one can settle, which is exactly why it endures. It turns on three questions the doctrine can't prove.

1. The Kept — spared, or slighted? If the Mother blesses everyone, why are about a quarter Given no colour at all?

- The Tender reading (majority/orthodox): the Kept are given wholeness — a real gift, chosen for them. To be Kept is to be trusted to need nothing added.
- The Wanting reading (minority): the Kept were passed over — loved, but not chosen, and the doctrine of "wholeness" is a kindness the faithful tell them. This reading quietly stings, and shapes how some Kept feel about the festival.

2. The Struck — still hers, or not? The Struck receive a Condition the Tree never handed out. Did the Mother reach through the threshold too, or did something else give the gift?

- The Wide-Hand reading: she meets people at every door — the drowning, the oath, the death — the Tree is only her ordinary hand. The Struck are fully hers.
- The Narrow-Hand reading: she gives only at the Tree; the Struck received their Condition by some other means, which is why the Struck are "a little suspect." This reading is the seed of real social friction toward the Struck.

3. Does a mind choose at all? — the believer/skeptic line proper.

- Believers: the fittingness of the gifts, the care of the Kept, the way the Struck feel received — these add up to a Someone.
- Skeptics: “it’s just what the Trees do.” Biology, or a phenomenon so old it wears a face we gave it. The grafting is observable horticulture; the choosing mind is an inference they decline to make.

Because the faith is orthopraxic, a skeptic who tends their Tithe and brings their children to the Tree is a good member of the Motherfaith — belief in the Mother is honoured but not policed. This keeps the skeptic sincere and un-persecuted.

Every branch is a good-faith position. No faction is secretly right-and-evil.

Two sayings

The Tender’s blessing, spoken over each child at the Leaf-Fall:

“What falls to you, wear well. What is kept from you, keep. The Hand that reaches is the Mother’s own — and the Mother does not reach twice by chance.”

On its face: comfort and the “tend your gift” ethic. The line asserts intent behind the fall — the very thing skeptics deny.

A Kept-child’s saying (folk, half-consoling, half-barbed):

“The Tree that gives to all its neighbours held me instead. I have decided that is not the same as being forgotten.”

On its face: the Tender reading of the Kept, made personal and a little defiant. Underneath: it dramatizes the schism — “I have decided” is a choice made against doubt, not a certainty.

Five faiths

The Motherfaith is the dominant faith of the Turning lands and not the only one. Five lived faiths, each answering a different experience the Trees (or their absence) actually produce. This is not a list of gods.

Faith	Home	A Condition is...	Everyday name	Own name
the Leaf-Mother	everywhere the Trees stand; born on Maiethorn	a gift chosen	the Motherfaith	Maieth
the Watching	Maiethorn's oldest districts	a seeing , later named a gift	the Watching	Haelthael
the Fair Hand	Strandoren's ports and houses	a bargain struck	the Fair Hand	Leddoren
the Old Ways	Heskoren's groves and doors	the land making its own	the Old Ways	Vaeloren
the Open Table	Kumbaan, the Sundering Isle	a mainland hunger they never had	the Open Table	Ndeyaan

The three mainland rivals sit inside the settled world. The Open Table is the isolate: grown with no Tree and no Mother-name.

Smaller household rites, quay-charms, and Kind-customs exist and stay local — they are not load-bearing. Clergy of the five houses: the tree-wardens (Motherfaith), the Watchers, the Book-Hands, the Door-Keepers, the Table-Keepers, and the Shore-Sitters (isle flavor).

The argument (what a becoming is)

Every faith in this world has to answer the same fact: most people become something they were not born. They do not agree on the verb.

- Given. The Motherfaith says chosen. The Watching says seen. The Fair Hand says signed. The Old Ways say the Tree is a late guest at a door the land already kept.
- Struck. The Motherfaith argues whether she reached the threshold. The Watching says the threshold was always a place of seeing. The Fair Hand says a later contract, struck in extremity. The Old Ways say this is the oldest becoming — the land's own children.
- Kept. Gift of wholeness / passed-over / no bargain taken / the land had no door for you that year. Same hug; four readings.
- Tithe. Honest weight of a gift / the cost someone once paid / the term of the contract / the land's due. Same upkeep; four ethics.

No faith is a villain-theology. Each is a good-faith answer to a real seam (the fittingness of gifts, the thinning at the edge, the Bound's written terms, the Struck who change with no Tree nearby, a whole isle that never Turned). Dual practice is common, not scandalous.

How they live together

Orthopraxy is the peace. Because the Motherfaith counts you by what you do at the Tree, a Watcher who brings their child, a Settler who stands as witness to the colour, a Kin-speaker who also walks the old doors — all can belong at the same Leaf-Fall. Doctrine fights; the festival usually doesn't.

Conflict is local, not crusading.

- Maiethorn — the fight is at the centre. The Watching and the Motherfaith share the same Trees and argue over the blessing spoken there. Threnmaieth files Watchers on the Threnhael as a known, counted dissent (the Grown-Over). Pressure, not pogrom.
- Strandoren — faith worn light, so the fight is for the Bound and the books. The Fair Hand and the Motherfaith compete for the same oath-keepers in the same port. Lestrand prices both and polices neither.
- Heskoren — the fight is over the grove. The Old Ways were there before the grafts; the Motherfaith burns hottest where the gift is scarcest. A dying Tree has two claimants. Vaethorn's piety makes this tender and sharp, not holy-war loud.
- The Sundering Isle — almost no contact. A Yumboe on the mainland is a guest at everyone else's rite; they keep table and find the noon-day faiths loud.

Syncretism (what actually happens, most years):

Pair	The common blend	The hard edge
Motherfaith + Watching	Same Tree, two blessings; families inherit which words they use	Threnmaieth's roll wants one name for what you are
Motherfaith + Fair Hand	Leaf-Fall as festival and signing-watch; Tithe paid as both tending and settling	Gift-language vs. debt-language over the same Bound soul
Motherfaith + Old Ways	Pilgrimage to a graft and threshold-walking the old doors	Who tends a sickening Tree — warden or door-keeper
Any mainland + Open Table	A rare shared supper; "no one is a stranger twice"	Almost none — the storm-wall is the boundary

A shared teaching-story — the Child at Four Doors — is told in all five houses with a different last line. That is how the world argues without a council.

The Leaf-Mother remains a belief in public life. The other faiths stay beliefs. The Watching claims to remember a cost; that claim is fuel, not an answer.

The Watching

The heartland heresy of Maiethorn. An older Tree-faith the Motherfaith grew over — not a frontier dissent, a centre one. They keep the Tree and refuse the Mother-name. They say the colours fall because the Tree sees, not because a she chooses.

Everyday: the Watching. Their own name: Haelthael — hayl-THALE — hael + thael, “the Tree kept whole.” They mean the Tree before anyone split it into a Mother and her hands. The Motherfaith’s soft name is the First Watching; Threnmaieth’s file-name is the Grown-Over.

Shape of the faith

- A witness-religion, not a gift-religion. The founding fact is that the Tree looks. A colour is a seeing made visible, not a present wrapped in a leaf. To live well is to name what was seen, not to thank a giver you cannot prove.
- Orthopraxy, older than the Motherfaith’s. They stand at the same Leaf-Fall. They will not say the Tender’s blessing as the wardens say it. Practice binds them to the town; the withheld word is the whole dissent.
- Divine character: they will not give it one. The Tree is not a mother, not a bargain-partner, not a land-spirit in a new dress. It is the Tree. Naming it Maieth is, to them, the overlay — a comfort the core invented when the seeing needed a face.
- Identity marker: they keep Thaeloren (“the Tree that witnesses”) and refuse Hand of the Mother. Same wood; the title is the schism.

Doctrine (as believed)

The Before. In the beginning the world was Kind and Kind alone — this they share with the Motherfaith. Then the Tree was already there, watching. The Giving came after the Watching. The Mother-name came after that. Each layer is a story laid over a seeing.

She chooses well is a later sentence. Fittingness, they say, is what a witness produces: the Tree sees what you can carry and what the town will need, and the leaf matches the seeing. Intent without a mother. The skeptics of the Motherfaith are, to a Watcher, almost right — and still too quick to call the Tree a phenomenon with no mind. There is a mind. It does not owe you a lap.

The cost is remembered. Haelthael teaching holds that the Giving was not free — something was spent, someone was lessened, the Tree (or whatever stands behind it) does not reach twice by chance because reaching costs. They will not name a Mother who pretends otherwise. What the cost was they will not agree on. They agree it was real.

The Kept were seen. A hug and no colour is a seeing of wholeness, or a seeing that did not reach — they argue this as fiercely as the Motherfaith does, without the consolation of a mother's lap. The hug is still a witness. It is not an oversight and not (they insist) a slight dressed as love.

The Struck were seen at a harder door. A drowning, an oath, a death — the Tree is the ordinary place of seeing; the threshold is an older one. The Watching does not need the Wide-Hand / Narrow-Hand split. Seeing was never confined to a grafted scion.

Practice

- The Night Watch. The night before Turning-Week, Watchers keep a silent vigil at the town Tree. No blessing. No colour-reading. The point is to be seen seeing — to match the Tree's attention with their own.
- The withheld blessing. They attend the Leaf-Fall (orthopraxy; their children Turn). When the warden says the Tender's line, a Watcher household speaks their own, quietly:

“What falls, was seen. What is kept, was seen. The Tree does not reach twice by chance.”

Same cadence as the Motherfaith's blessing; the Mother is not in it. Towns that have lived together a long time barely notice the difference. Threnmaieth notices.

- Name what you saw. After a Turning, a Watcher does not say tend what you're given. They sit with the child and describe the fall — the colour, the way the leaf came, what the year will ask. Devotion is accurate speech.

- Pre-Mother names. In Haelthael liturgy the origin Tree is only Thaeloren. “First Hand” is tolerated as poetry. “Hand of the Mother” is the overlay they will not say.

Watchers are not priests. They keep the Night Watch, teach the withheld blessing, and (where a town will have it) offer a second reading of a rare or mixed fall: not authoritative over the tree-warden, a witness alongside. In Threnmaieth they are a known column on the roll.

The Watching has no seat in the Awakening Tree's shadow — that seat was grown-over by the First Seat. Their oldest rooms are under older chapels, or in houses that never took a warden's lintel. The archaeology is the theology. Two acts, not four offices.

The live schism

1. The Masked. The Mother is a later face the Witness learned to wear — or a name people needed, and the Tree allowed. Syncretic; almost Motherfaith; common in mixed families. A Masked Watcher will stand for the Tender's blessing and add the withheld line under it.
2. The Bare Tree. There was never a she. The overlay is a comfort the core invented, and comfort is not the same as truth. Harder, smaller, the ones Threnmaieth files most carefully.
3. What was spent? Both branches agree the Giving cost. They do not agree what: a wound in the Tree, a year the watching failed, a someone who became the wood. This is the question they will not close. It is also the one the Motherfaith most wants left unasked.

A lintel-inscription

Recut, found when a warden-chapel on Maiethorn was re-floored — the new beam faces the Tree; this face was turned to the stone.

We kept the watch before the name. The wood was already looking. If a mother came after, she came to a work begun. Do not thank the latecomer for the seeing.

On its face: heresy, stubborn, local. Underneath: a claim that the Tree predates the Mother-name — which is exactly the memory the sacred centre cannot afford to be curious about.

The Fair Hand

The fortune-and-contract faith of Strandoren. A mercantile theology that reads Conditions not as gifts given but as bargains struck. The world is a ledger of deals; the Tithe is a term, not a devotion; when the book is closed you are even, and owe no gratitude forever. Direct doctrinal rival to the Motherfaith's gift-language, at home on the trade continent and especially among the Bound.

Everyday: the Fair Hand. Their own name: Leddoren — led-OR-en — ledd + oren, “the witnessed account.” Lestrand slang: the Settling. The Motherfaith's name for them: the Bargainers. A Bound who has paid their year's Terms will say they have a closed book.

Shape of the faith

- A settling-religion, not a salvation-religion and not a gift-religion. No one is being rescued, and no one is being given something they cannot refuse. A gift you cannot put down is an imposition.

The founding ethic is fair terms: know what you owe, pay it, walk.

- Orthopraxy of the book. What makes you of the Fair Hand is that you keep accounts honestly — Tithe, contract, witness — not that you deny the Mother in the street. Many Settlers still bring a child to the Tree. They attend as witnesses to a signing.
- Divine character: a counterparty, or none. The faith splits on whether anyone sits across the table. Both branches agree the table is real. The Leaf-Mother, if she exists, is a giver who will not show her terms — which, to a Settler, is the one unforgivable clause.
- Identity marker: a small personal book (not a census — that is Threnmaieth's sin) in which a Settler writes colour, Tithe, and what they are owed. The Bound did not invent this; they are simply the ones whose book is also a contract.

Doctrine (as believed)

Nothing is given. The Leaf-Fall is a striking of terms. The colour is the grant; the Tithe is the price; the town's need is the other side of the deal. "Tend what you're given" is how a creditor teaches you to be grateful for the interest.

The Bound prove the model. A Bound chose, named a grant, named Terms, named a Pledge. The Fair Hand says this is not a special horror — it is the same grammar as every becoming, written large enough to read. The Motherfaith's fear of the Bound is, to them, embarrassment: the Bound make the ledger visible.

The Kept declined, or were not offered. No bargain taken; nothing owed; nothing owed to them. This is a cooler dignity than spared-or-slighted. On Lestrand it rhymes with calling the Kept the free. The Fair Hand did not invent that slight; they gave it a theology.

The Struck signed later, in a storm. Extremity is when people accept bad terms. A drowning, an oath, a death — of course the book opens then. The Struck are not suspects; they are people who bargained without a clerk. The faith's kindness is to settle the year fairly after the fact (a hall, a warrant — vouching-as-novation). A Bound's Terms are the exception: those belong to the Counterparty, not to a clerk. Its cruelty is the same motion: a Struck who cannot settle fades, and the quay steps around them.

Grace is a closed book. Not forgiveness, not a mother's lap. You paid. You are even. Walk.

Practice

- The signing-watch. Settlers attend the Leaf-Fall as witnesses, not petitioners. They do not speak the Tender's blessing. They speak, if they speak:

“Grant and term, seen and spoken. The book is open. Keep it fair.”

- Public settling. Tithe paid in a way a neighbour can see — not confession, clearing. A Bound’s oath-day is the high holy day: Terms recited, the year’s book closed or marked owing. The Motherfaith calls this ostentation. The Fair Hand calls it the only honest worship.
- Quay-blessings. Short, worn, eroded-tongue: fair wind, fair term. Said over a hull, a contract, a marriage. The sacred and the commercial use the same sentence, which is the point.
- The personal book. Colour, Tithe, debts, what the year owes you. Private. Not the Threnhael. A Settler will die to keep a crown-clerk out of it — the Fair Hand’s one shared fury with every other faith on that subject.

Book-hands (also Settlers) are notaries who are also theologians. They witness signings, teach children how to keep a book, and settle a Struck’s civic year (a hall, a warrant). They recite a Bound’s Terms on oath-day; they do not rewrite those Terms (the Counterparty’s clause, not a clerk’s). On Lestrand they are often the same people as commercial clerks; the faith is the profession, worn lightly.

The Fair Hand has guild-rooms and quay-shrines, not a mother-church. A “high house” in a rich port is just the oldest book-room. No membership roll — a roll would be a Threnhael.

The live schism

1. The Counterparty. Something sits across the table — a mind, a power, a hand that is fair rather than mothering. The Bound’s unknown is this branch’s whole theology. They will not call it Mother (her terms are hidden); they will not call it demon (that is the Motherfaith’s scare-word). They call it the other hand.
2. The Book Alone. The world is the ledger. No one is across the table. This is the secular twin of the Motherfaith’s skeptics, and it lives easily on Lestrand. Practice is identical; the argument is whether gratitude has an address.

Both branches agree that hidden terms are the sin. That is why they cannot join the Motherfaith even when they share a festival: “the Mother does not reach twice by chance” is, to them, a clause with no number on it.

From a Bound’s working contract

The form-words a Lestrand book-hand uses when the grant is ordinary and the Terms are not:

I was not given. I asked, and I was answered, and I named what I would pay. If a mother had wanted me she would have sent a leaf, not a clause. I prefer the clause. I can read it.

On its face: a Bound's pride, a little cold. Underneath: the Fair Hand's whole case against gift-doctrine — and a blindness the document cannot afford: that a clause you can read is not the same as a love you cannot price.

The Old Ways

The ancestor-and-land faith of Heskoren. It predates the grafts. It says the Mother's reach is new here, and the land was already making children of its own — the Struck, the Taken-In — at rivers, drowning-pools, oath-stones, and groves. The Trees are guests, not the source.

Everyday — and their own common name: the Old Ways. Liturgical: Vaeloren — vay-LOR-en — vael + oren. They use vael in an older sense: not “a Condition Given” but what the land yields. The Motherfaith, they say, narrowed the word to a leaf-colour. Vaethorn-pious speech calls them the Before-Faith; the Taken-In among them say the Green Kin.

Shape of the faith

- A land-and-kin religion. The founding fact is that place makes people. A river that has drowned and returned, a hill that took someone in, an oath-stone that heard a vow — these are the old doors. The grafted Tree is a new door, welcome if it behaves.
- Practice is walking, not watching a colour. You keep the Old Ways by going to the doors, feeding the kin who stayed, and standing for the Struck when a town will not. Belief about the Mother is secondary; many Kin-speakers also bring a child to a healthy graft when they can reach one.
- Divine character: the land is many, and the dead stay. Not one mother. Not a ledger. Hills, waters, old trees (the wild kin of motherwood, not the grafts), and the people who went into them. Ancestors are not ghosts to be feared (the Returned are a different door); they are kin who remained in the ground.
- Identity marker: a worn token from your door — river-stone, grove-twigg, a pinch of hill — carried the way a Settler carries a book. No two look alike. That is the theology.

Doctrine (as believed)

The land was first. Before grafts, before pilgrimage, Heskoren's people already became things. The Struck are not a problem the Motherfaith has failed to place — they are the oldest rite, the land doing what the land does. The Taken-In are the grove's own children, not a frontier embarrassment.

Vael meant yield. Grain, game, a child returned from water, a person the hill kept. The Motherfaith's vael (a Given Condition) is a special case they mistook for the whole word. To call a leaf a vael is fine.

To say only a leaf is a vael is a theft of speech.

Grafts are guests. A healthy Tree is a new kin-house. You may tend it. You may Turn under it. You may not pretend it invented becoming, or that a town without one is empty of the sacred. A sickening Tree is a guest who is dying in your grove — the fight with the tree-wardens is who is host.

The Kept are a year the land had no door. Not spared, not slighted, not free labour. Some years a door does not open for you. You are still the land's. Next year, or the drowning-year, or never. The waiting that Vaethorn sanctifies as pilgrimage is, here, just weather.

The Mother is a late name. Either the land wearing a face the newcomers needed (the Guest-reading) or a claiming (the First-reading). Both agree she did not arrive first.

Practice

- Threshold-walking. At the year's hinges — not only High Solstice — people walk the old doors of their district. You greet the water, the hill, the stone. You leave food. You do not ask for a colour. You ask to be known.
- Ancestor-meals. A place at the board for the ones in the ground. Quiet, domestic, easy to miss as religion if you came from Maiethorn looking for a chapel. The courtesy is the rite.
- Standing for the Struck. When a person changes later and alone, the Old Ways do not take them to a Tree to be acknowledged as Given. They take them back to the door that made them — if it can be found — and name them kin. The Motherfaith's quiet receiving-rite and this one sometimes happen in the same week, for the same person, and the argument is which name goes first.
- The contested grove. An ailing graft in an old Taken-In green is the signature fight: warden vs. door-keeper, guest vs. host, pilgrimage-scarcity vs. "we had ways." Neighbours who both love the wood.

Door-keepers (also Kin-speakers) know which doors still open, they speak at ancestor-meals, they stand for the unvouched Struck when they can. Not a hierarchy; a reputation. A famous door-keeper is just the one three valleys will walk to. Two jobs, often one mouth.

The Old Ways cannot have a mother-church. The land is the seat. Vaethorn's tree-wardens find this infuriating and, in a dry year, quietly useful. They walk doors; they do not carry scions.

The live schism

1. The Guest-reading. The Mother is the land in a new dress. Grafts are kin. Syncretic; common in Vaethorn towns that finally got a Tree and did not want to throw their grandparents out of the rite. They will pilgrimage and walk the doors.

2. The First-reading. The grafts are a claiming. The old doors were enough. Harder, thinner-reach districts, the ones still waiting on a scion that will not take. They will tend a dying graft as a guest in their house and still refuse the Tender’s blessing.

Both branches revere the Struck and the Taken-In. That is the load-bearing courtesy. A reading that started pitying them as “unreached” has already become Motherfaith.

Said at a drowning-stone

On Heskoren’s wet margin, the year after a graft sickened and a child came back from the river Changed:

The tree is young. The water is not. If a mother sent the water she sent it before she sent the leaf, and she has not told the wardens. We will feed both. We will not let either pretend it was first.

On its face: frontier courtesy, a little barbed. Underneath: the Old Ways’ whole case — and the seam they cannot see. They have correctly felt that becoming happens at doors with no healthy Tree.

The Open Table

The isolate faith of Kumbaan. Grown with no Tree and no Mother-name. The good people keep the night, set a place for hands that have no bodies, and hold that a stranger at the table is the holiest thing in the world — not a colour, not a graft, not a bargain.

Mainland everyday: the Open Table, or sailors’ the Moon-Feast. Their own name: Ndeyaan — ndey-AHN — the night-keeping. In full courtesy, Bakhna Ndeya — “the good night.” The opening of every meal that matters is already their creed: “No one is a stranger twice.”

Shape of the faith

- A hospitality-religion. The founding fact is the table. To feed and be fed is how the living sit with the staying-kin and with anyone the storm-wall did not keep out. There is no Leaf-Fall because, they say, there was nothing missing to give.
- Practice is the meal. Ndeyaan has almost no clergy and no chapel. The rite is supper under the moon, a place set for hands you can see and a body you cannot, daylight reserved for sleep. A Yumboe who keeps this on the mainland is still of the Open Table. A mainlander who sits once is a guest; who sits twice is kin.

- Divine character: the hill, the moon, the ones who stayed. Not a mother. Not a ledger. The dead do not leave — they stay as hands. Whether those hands are the dead (the Staying) or the hill's own courtesy (the Serving) is the house-argument. Neither reading makes the good people ghosts. They are a living Kind. The idiom is ancestral; the bodies are warm.
- Identity marker: an extra place laid, even when the household is poor. The unseen hands make this possible. That is not a metaphor they use. It is the furniture.

Doctrine (as believed)

Wholeness is the default. The mainland invented a hunger and called it a gift. On Kumbaen you are born Yumboe and that is enough. If the good people become anything else, they do not become it at a Tree (there is none). The how is not a doctrine they owe strangers; it is a family matter, and they are not in a hurry.

The dead stay to serve. Folklore on the mainland calls Yumboes spirits of the dead. They find this rude and, in a sideways way, nearly true: the hands are the staying-kin. The living host. The staying pour. A feast that outshines its means is a theological statement — the household is larger than the bodies you can count.

The moon wakes both. Night is the shared day of the living and the staying. Daylight is a Sabbath of sleep, not a fallen hour. Mainland noon-faiths are loud the way a guest who will not sit is loud.

A stranger is the sacrament. The storm-wall keeps the world out. Anyone who crosses it has already been through drowning-water. You do not test them with a colour. You feed them. The second supper is the rite of belonging. This is why a lone Yumboe on Strandoren becomes a host wherever they land — they are still keeping Ndeyaan, with whatever table they can make.

The Mother is a story about a quiet table, told too loud. They do not hate her. They have never met her. They do not understand why a people would need to be chosen in order to be wanted.

Practice

- The moon-feast. The ordinary high rite: night, hill-hall or open turf, the extra place, the unseen hands fetching and pouring. Songs. No colour-reading. No terms recited.
- The place set. Even a poor house lays it. To omit it is the one real impiety — not because the staying starve (they do not) but because you have counted the household too small.
- No one is a stranger twice. Spoken at the second sitting. The first night you are a guest (and a guest is already sacred). The second, you are of the table. Mainlanders who hear this as a proverb have missed that it is a legal sentence in all but parchment.
- Daylight sleep. The glare is not holy and not cursed. It is when the good people and the staying-kin rest. A Yumboe abroad will still take their long rest when the moon is down if they can; they will not make a scene about it.

Table-keepers (also hill-hosts) are almost not clergy. The person whose hall the valley comes to on the bright nights. Reputation, not office. One job: keep the table.

Shore-sitters (also wall-waiters) are the other isle job. They sit the storm-beach and wait. They do not swim out. The living go uphill to a table.

A Yumboe abroad is a table-keeper by necessity. One person can keep Ndeyaan in a Lestrand attic. That is how the faith travels, when it travels at all. Recruits by faith (who will lay the extra place), not by Kind. No Kumbaan mission.

The live schism

1. The Staying. The unseen hands are the dead — grandparents, the drowned, the ones the hill kept. Ancestral-literal. Older tellings; still common in deep-hill halls. Not a ghost-cult: the dead are family who took the serving-work.
2. The Serving. The hands are the hill's own courtesy, the good people's oldest wonder, not a roster of names. Gentler, majority in the surface-facing halls, easier to explain to a mainland guest who has gone pale.

Both branches set the extra place. A Serving host who will not say the dead's names and a Staying host who will not stop saying them will still pass the same cup. The argument is for after the dishes.

A place-setting blessing

Said to the empty plate before the hands arrive. Taught to children. Heard once, badly copied, by a Strandor sailor who did come back.

We have counted you. Sit. If you have a name we have not learned it yet; if you have a colour we have no tree to read it. The moon is enough light. Eat, and be the household.

On its face: hospitality, almost twee. Underneath: a whole cosmology that has never needed the Leaf-Fall. The sailor who copied it thought it was a grace. It is a claim that wanted was never a gift.

Kumbaan keeps the moon, not the High Solstice. A mainland priest may notice that their holiest week is, here, just weather.

The Child at Four Doors

A teaching-story told in every house. The bones stay the same; the last line does not. Children hear their own ending first. Travellers hear the others and do not sleep well.

The story (as told)

A child came to the year of their Turning and found four doors where the town said there was one.

The first door was a Tree, and a leaf hung over it, coloured, waiting.

The second door was a book, open, a line already drawn, a space for a name.

The third door was a river-stone, wet, older than the road.

The fourth door was a table with a place set, and no one sitting in it.

The child asked which door was theirs.

No one would say. Each keeper only said: this one opens.

The child sat down in the middle and waited to be chosen, or seen, or signed, or fed.

They waited a long time.

When they looked up, all four doors were open, and the child was still in the middle, and the year had gone on without a colour, or with one — the tellings do not agree — and the child had to stand, and pick, and did, and the story ends before you see which.

The last lines (by house)

The bones above are common. What a house adds last is the faith:

- Motherfaith (Tender): The Mother had opened the Tree before the child sat down. The waiting was the hug. They were wanted either way.
- Motherfaith (Wanting): The Mother opened one door and the child was looking at the other three. That is how a person is passed over: by having too many doors.
- The Watching: The Tree had been looking the whole time. The other three doors were people talking. The child was seen. That was the Turning. The leaf was optional.
- The Fair Hand: The child signed by sitting. Waiting is a term. Someone should have told them the price of a year in the middle.
- The Old Ways: The stone was wet before the Tree was planted. The child was already the land's. The waiting was weather.
- The Open Table: The place was set. The child was the guest, then the household. There was never a test. The other doors are how hungry people decorate a supper.

Skeptics of every faith tell a seventh ending, which is not kind and is very short: There were not four doors. There was a child, and a year, and a town that needed a story.

Variants

- On Maiethorn the four doors are carved on the underside of old lintels; wardens call it decoration.
 - On Strandoren it is a quay-song with a chorus the Bound like: name the term or get up.
 - On Heskoren the river-stone door is told first, and the Tree is the third, and some tellers omit the book entirely.
 - On Kumbaen there is only the table. The other doors are “mainland verses,” told as a curiosity after the dishes, if a guest insists.
 - A Threnmaieth school-version adds a clerk who writes all four doors on a roll. Children are not meant to laugh. They do.

The Tree-Wardens

The working clergy of the Motherfaith. They are one order with offices, not rival chapters. They recruit by office, practice, and sometimes Condition, never by Kind.

Everyday, everywhere: tree-wardens, or just wardens. Liturgical: the Orenhael — or-EN-hayl — oren “to witness / speak true” + hael “whole, hale”: those who say the fall truly and keep the Tree sound. Vaethorn’s second word is Hands-folk; Lestrاند’s is tree-tenders; Threnmaieth files them as the Reckoned Hands.

Shape of the order

- One order, several offices. The Motherfaith does not run rival chapters. The live argument is already the three-branch schism (Tender / Wanting, Wide-Hand / Narrow-Hand, believer / skeptic). The Orenhael holds that argument inside one house.
- Needed before they are holy. A town keeps a warden because someone must water the wood, name a rare colour, and know when a scion is dying. Doctrine is extra. This is why a quiet skeptic can hold a town-hearth and why Lestrاند still pays its tenders.
- Collegial at the origin, singular in the town. The First Seat is a college, not a throne. A town has one warden-hearth. The Seat cannot micromanage a far graft, and does not pretend to.
- A gift-religion’s hands, not a salvation-religion’s inquisitors. They do not police belief. They tend, they speak, they carry.

The warden-hearth (the town)

Every town with a mature Tree keeps a warden-hearth — a house on the square or in the temple-yard, close enough that blight is smelled before it is announced. The warden (sometimes a small household of apprentice and elder) does the civic-sacred work:

- Tree-tending — watering rites, blight-watch, the ordinary care of mortal wood.
- The Leaf-Fall — they officiate. They bring the child under the boughs. They wait with the town.
- The Speaking — they confirm the colour aloud. Folk-known colours (deep red, storm-grey, lamp-amber, sea-blue, pale stone, copper-green) any neighbour can read; the warden's word makes the reading civic. Rare, mixed, or argumentative falls are why the office exists. A white-fire fall is sent to the First Seat by runner — a town-warden who names Phoenix from a book has just made history, and a problem.
- Receiving the Struck — the quiet after-the-fact rite at the Tree (not a Turning; the Tree does not Strike). How warmly it is done follows the warden's Wide-Hand or Narrow-Hand lean, which is how the schism reaches the square.

A new town without a mature Tree borrows a neighbour's warden and a neighbour's canopy until its own scion comes of age. That borrowed year is remembered: we Turned at Harrow's Tree before we had our own.

The Speaking (colour-authority)

The Speaking is an act, not always a separate person. In a small town the warden Speaks. In a pilgrimage-town or at the First Seat, a Speaker is the elder who holds the rare-colour texts and the last word on a mixed fall.

They do not invent the palette. They keep it. The folk already know the commons; the Speaker is the reason a copper-green is not mistaken for the hug, and the reason a Watcher's second reading stays a witness alongside, not a rival authority. Dual practice is common. Two authoritative Speakers in one square is a fight.

The Road-hands (graft and sickness)

Road-hands carry living scions in living earth, plant them with ceremony, and are the ones sent when a Tree sickens. Everyday name everywhere; liturgical Thaelvaeth — THALE-vayth — thael + vaeth, “the Tree gone to the waiting.”

They are the order's thin edge. A dying Tree is a civic crisis; a waiting town is a political one. The First Seat writes the Cutting-leave (who may take wood, and for where). The Road-hand walks it. Far from the Motherwood they have almost no authority except the scion in the cart and whatever reputation three valleys will grant.

Mandate: keep sickening Trees alive; deliver a living scion to a town that has already waited too long. The enemy is time, thin soil, and a Cutting-leave written for someone else.

Constraints: living earth and mortal wood only; a skeleton circuit of hands for a whole thin-reach; authority that expires a week out from the Motherwood — they advise, they do not command a town that has decided to meet a feared Struck with a rope.

Institutional weather: the First Seat's support is conditional. A live Tree is a quiet success no one writes down. A dead one is a name on a complaint. Success gets you the next hard road, not a better cart.

Who ends up on it: the ranging, the Kept who will not sit a comfortable hearth, the Wide-Hand Struck who still wants the Tree to acknowledge. Not a Kind-unit. Not the Seat's favourites.

The college will grant a grudging Cutting-leave and keep the queue.

The First Seat (the college)

The faith's central authority sits in the Motherwood about Thaeloren, on Maiethorn. Everyday: the First Seat. Not a pope's palace. A college of Speakers, elder wardens, and the Cutting-leave desk.

What the Seat actually holds (and this is all it holds):

- The graft-source. Scions are cut from the Awakening Tree, or — in practice — from an established healthy town Tree acting on the origin's behalf. The Seat authorizes the cut. It does not uniquely possess every knife. A far college-town that cuts without leave is in schism with the Seat, not with the Tree.
- The rare-colour texts. Phoenix. Argumentative mixed falls. The book a town-warden has never opened.
- The queue. Which waiting settlement receives the next scion. This is the order's real power, and its injustice.

It does not appoint every town-warden. A hearth is taken by apprenticeship and confirmed by the town that watched the new warden tend a year — citizenship-by-witness applied to the clergy. The Seat confirms Road-hands and Speakers. That is as far as a pre-print world can reach.

Who may be a warden

Not by Kind. A Kitsune hearth-child and a human neighbour hold the same office if they can tend wood and speak a colour. The Orenhael has no Fox-chapter, no ridge-chapter, no Kind-nation inside it.

By practice first. You are taken as a hand — apprenticed to a warden-hearth, confirmed when the town has watched you through a Turning-Week. Orthopraxy: what you do at the Tree makes you of the order. What you privately believe about who chooses is the schism, not the hiring test.

Skeptics at the hearth; believers at the Seat. A town-warden may be a sincere skeptic — “it is what the Trees do” — and still be a good warden, because the wood is mortal and the colours are folk-known. The First Seat runs believer-heavy. Pilgrimage wants a Someone; the rare-colour texts are kept as hers. A skeptic Speaker at Thaeloren is possible and uncomfortable.

Condition leans, not Condition-gates. Offices attract the Tithes that fit them. This is vocation-shape, not a rule that locks anyone out.

Office	Often	Why the Tithe fits	Also, and welcome
Town-warden	the Kept	untithed; can sit a hearth year-round	anyone who will tend
Speaker (Seat and pilgrimage-towns)	Long-Lived	incorruptible memory of rare falls; the Phoenix texts are a century’s job	a sharp Kept scholar; a Wide-Hand Struck who has seen a threshold-colour from the other side
Road-hand	Two-Bodied	the road is the ranging	Kept; the Taken-In when the job is a sickening grove
Grove-tending / blight	the Taken-In	green Tithe + living wood	Root-Answered for the carrying-earth
Threshold-receiving	Struck wardens (Wide-Hand lean)	they have been on the far side of the door	any warden the town will stand for

The feared-licensed (the Stilled, heavy Far-Voiced, Bound) are not barred. They are rare at the First Seat: a Stilled Speaker is a civic comfort and a pilgrimage fright; a Bound warden is easier on Lestrand (where the faith is already a profession) than in the Motherwood (where a written Term next to a gift-doctrine looks like the Fair Hand leaking in). A Phoenix is never clergy. They are a problem the Seat cannot file.

Struck wardens must still be vouched anew like any Struck. The order is not a hiding-place from that seam.

How they live with the other houses

Orthopraxy is the peace. The Orenhael officiates the Leaf-Fall; the other four houses stand at it. Conflict is local.

House	Everyday arrangement	The hard edge
the Watching	Same Tree, two blessings. A Watcher may offer a second reading of a rare fall — witness alongside, not over.	Threnmaieth wants one name on the Threnhael. A Speaker who lets the withheld blessing stand is a column the crown can count.
the Fair Hand	Leaf-Fall as festival and signing-watch. Book-hands and wardens share a square on Lestrand and ignore each other’s sentences.	Gift-language vs. debt-language over the same Bound soul. A Bound warden is the seam.
the Old Ways	A healthy graft is a guest. Guest-reading Kin-speakers pilgrimage and walk the old doors.	A sickening Tree in an old grove: who is host — warden or door-keeper. Neighbours who both love the wood.
the Open Table	Almost no contact. A warden who crosses the storm-wall is a guest at supper. There is no Tree to tend.	None that matters. There is no mission-chapter on Kumbaan.

How they live in the three corners

Same order; the name and the injustice change.

- Vaethorn (Hands-folk). The warden is most of the state. Thin reach, hot faith, almost no guild to issue a licence. A Road-hand here is doing the Seat’s real work: sick Trees, borrowed Turnings, a scion that may not take. The soft injustice of the Warm lands sits on this hearth — a Kept apprentice pitied for “missing” the gift they are about to spend a life tending.
- Lestrand (tree-tenders). A paid civic office. The Leaf-Fall is a commercial milestone; the warden Speaks so the guild-ticket can open. Faith worn light. The Seat’s queue looks, from the docks, like any other scarce good. Cutting-leave can be brokered. That is Lestrand’s clergy-sin, and it does not require a heresy.
- Threnmaieth (the Reckoned Hands). The darkest pressure. The First Seat stands in the same Sacred Core as the Tallied Crown. The crown wants wardens named to the Threnhael as officers of the Reckoned Faith — colours written down, Speakers as clerks of stewardship. Some Speakers cooperate (they believe they are keeping the realm hale). Some refuse: the Tree witnessed; a ledger is a second, lesser seeing. The Orenhael does not dissolve Threnmaieth by being kind.

Proximity is pressure, not ownership. The college can refuse the roll — and some Speakers don't.

The scion-queue

A graft takes a generation to Turn. There are always more waiting towns than carrying-earth. Someone decides the order.

The First Seat frames the queue as horticulture: the wood will take here; the soil is thin there; the carrying-earth is needed for the first. All of that can be true. It is also a choice about who lives another twenty years sending children down the road to a neighbour's canopy — and those years run Kept-heavy and Struck-heavy, which the frontier already knows as weather.

The Leaf-Mother's kindness did not write the queue. People did.

Road-hands walk the consequence. They plant what they were given leave to plant. They sleep in the town that was not chosen, and they learn not to say queue.

Economy of the order

- Towns house and feed the warden-hearth. A civic stipend in kind — bread, wood, a place on the square. Not a tax on Conditions.
- Turning-Week is the festival share. Markets, reunion, the year's namings. The warden eats from the fair like any other needed office.
- Cutting-leave has a fee. Framed as the cost of carrying-earth and a Road-hand's year. Experienced, at the edge, as the price of a future Tree. Lestrand will broker it. Vaethorn will call it an offering. Threnmaieth will want it on the roll. Historically this is how the Seat captured a practice that began without it — the First Cut; the generation of argument; the paper that would not write who; the queue as a copy-right.
- Pilgrimage keeps the Seat. Offerings, lodging, the devout who settle in the Motherwood. The college is rich in proximity, not in a Condition-tithe.

The Orenhael is not the Tithe-infrastructure sector. Venting-halls, greens, ranging-commons, and the safety-guilds live there. Wardens point a new Given at a guild. They do not licence the Stilled.

A Cutting-leave

First Seat hand, carried north in the same earth as the scion. The verso is travel-stained; the recto is clean.

The wood will take at Harrow's green. It will not take this year at the three hamlets past the ford — the soil is thin there, and the carrying-earth is needed for the first. Cut from a healthy hand, not from the First, and married with the watering-words. If the scion sickens, send to the Seat; do not cut a second without leave. The Mother does not reach twice by chance, and neither do we.

On its face: competent horticulture, a little cold, the Tender's blessing reused as a shipping-clause. Underneath: the queue confessing itself. The three hamlets will run Kept-heavy and call it weather.

The Watchers

The working people of the Watching. They are not priests and they have no mother-church. The First Seat grew over the rooms that would have been one. What they keep is a vigil and a second voice.

Everyday, everywhere they are known: Watchers. Liturgical: the Nethoren — neth-OR-en — neth “night” + oren “to witness”: those who keep the night and speak what was seen. Vaethorn's second word is the night-kin; Lestrاند barely has one (vigil-folk, when a clerk needs a label); Threnmaieth files the house as the Grown-Over and the people who keep the vigil as the second column.

In one sentence: they are the neighbour who will sit up with the Tree the night before Turning-Week, and the second pair of eyes a family sends for when a leaf comes down strange — they describe, they do not confirm. They have day jobs. The house is a practice, not a wage.

Shape of the order

- No seat. The archaeology is the theology. The Watching has no college in the Motherwood. Their oldest rooms sit under older chapels, or in houses that never took a warden's lintel. A Watcher who wants a “mother-church” has already become something else.
- Two acts, not four offices. The Night Watch is what the house does — anyone of Haelthael may keep it. The Second Reading is a reputation, not a lintel: the person a town will ask to sit beside the warden when a fall is rare, mixed, or argued. There is no Speaker-equivalent with the last word, no Road-hand circuit, no Cutting-leave desk. Those jobs belong to a faith that has a Tree to carry.
- Needed as a witness, not as a civic utility. A town does not keep a Watcher the way it keeps a warden. The wood still wants watering. What a Watcher is for is accurate speech, and a night of matching the Tree's attention with their own. Lestrاند can live without that. Threnmaieth cannot stop counting it.
- A witness-religion's people, not a heresy-court's. They do not police the Mother-name. They withhold it.

If you meet one

A Watcher looks like a neighbour. Baker, weaver, a Long-Lived who copies texts, a Kept who sits a quiet hearth. They do not wear a lintel-mark (that is the warden). You know them because someone said ask the old room or send for the one who sat last year's mixed fall, or because you saw them under the Tree the night before Turning-Week with no lamp and no blessing.

They are useful the way a second opinion is useful. A town can live without them. A family that does not trust a single mouth on a strange leaf cannot.

Who knocks, and when

Who	Why they come	What the Watcher does	What they will not do
A household of the house	Turning-Week is coming; a child needs the withheld line taught	Sit at the hearth and make the child say what they saw last year — a neighbour’s fall, a colour in the square — until the speech is accurate	Will not teach the Tender’s blessing as the true one. A Masked Watcher will teach both, the withheld line under.
The family of a ten-year-old, after a rare or mixed fall	The warden Spoke one colour; the leaf looked like two; the year will argue	Sit beside the warden (or after, in the old room) and describe : stem, serration, how the leaf turned, whether the child flinched. Write it if asked. File nothing unless Threnmaieth makes them.	Will not Speak . Description is not confirmation. They will not say Two-Bodied or Answered if they saw two colours — they will say the two colours.
A Struck, or the people standing for one	The warden did the quiet receiving-rite; the family wants a witness who will not call it a late gift	Describe the threshold as a seeing at a harder door. Sit the rite. Say the withheld line if they say anything.	Will not take them to be acknowledged as Given . Will not novate terms (that is a Book-hand). Will not name them kin at a drowning-stone (that is a door-keeper).
A crown-clerk (Threnmaieth)	The Night Watch needs a time on the festival roll; a second reading needs a column	Give the night, or the description, as counted dissent	Will not call the withheld word a heresy they recant. A Bare Tree Watcher will not say she to make the docket cleaner.
Almost no one, most weeks	—	Their day job. Sweep the old room. Keep the coats hung.	Will not invent a reason to be sent for. They are not a circuit.

An ordinary year

Eleven months they are not “on duty.” They bake, copy, range, keep a stall. The house-work that still happens:

- Teaching the withheld blessing at the hearth, the year a child turns nine. Same cadence as the Tender's line; the Mother is not in it. This is how you can tell a Watcher household in a mixed street — the child can recite both, or will only recite one.
- Name what you saw, after any Turning they attend. Not a sermon. They sit with their child (or a neighbour's, if asked) and make the fall into accurate speech: the colour, the way the leaf came, what the year will ask. Devotion is the description. A sloppy Watcher is a bad Watcher.
- The old room. Sweep it. Keep the recut beam's hidden face from rotting, if the house still has one. Hang the Night Watch coats. In Threnmaith, answer the clerk who wants to know the room is still a room.
- They do not water the Tree. That is the warden-hearth. A Watcher who starts blight-watching has started doing the Orenhael's job.

The Night Watch

The night before Turning-Week — the eve of Eolthael, in a town that keeps the clergy's year. Watchers keep a silent vigil at the town Tree. No blessing. No colour-reading. No lamps if they can help it. The point is to be seen seeing.

This is not an office you are appointed to. A household that speaks the withheld blessing is expected to send someone. A town with three Watcher families may have six people under the boughs and no one in charge. A town with one old room under the chapel may have a single Long-Lived who has kept the same night for eighty years. Both are the order, such as it is.

They count the silences, not the hours. No one will explain this to a guest. A first-time sitter who asks how long is told until it has been seen.

They do not officiate the Leaf-Fall the next day. The warden does that. They attend (orthopraxy; their children Turn) and speak their own line when the Tender's blessing is said.

The Second Reading

Where a town will have it, a Watcher may sit a second reading of a rare or mixed fall: not authoritative over the warden, a witness alongside. They describe what they saw. They do not confirm. Confirmation is civic; it belongs to the Speaking.

How the hour actually runs:

1. The child is still under the boughs, or has just been walked to the warden-hearth. The town is still there. The warden Speaks — storm-grey, say.
2. If a household asked, or if the fall was mixed enough that the square muttered, the Watcher is already standing to the side. They do not interrupt the Speaking.

3. They say what they saw, in the square or afterward in the old room. Stem, serration, the turn, the flinch or the lack of one. They will use colour-words. They will resist Condition-names if the leaf was not one colour.
4. Most years the town nods at both mouths and goes to the fair. The child is Two-Bodied because the warden Spoke it, and also someone said there was amber at the edge, and that sentence lives in the family.

A Second-reader is just the Watcher three streets will send for when the fall is argumentative. No diploma. No Seat confirmation.

In Threnmaieth they are a known column on the Threnhael. The second reading is tolerated as counted dissent. The night is tolerated as a festival-eve custom. The withheld word is what the roll wants a name for.

What they carry

Almost nothing that looks like clergy. A scrap for the description (plain paper, not a book — a book would be a Settler's tool). A coat that lives in the old room and smells of last year's eve. In a Bare Tree household, no Mother-mark on the lintel; in a Masked one, the warden's mark and a second, older scratch underneath that a clerk can miss.

They have no stamp, no Cutting-leave, no ticket. They cannot licence a Stilled. They cannot plant a Tree.

What they refuse

- They will not Speak. If a town has no warden that year, they will still only describe. A civic confirmation from a Watcher is the house breaking itself.
- They will not take a warden's lintel. The archaeology is the theology: houses that never took one, rooms under chapels.
- They will not police the Mother-name in the street. They withhold it.
- They will not travel as a circuit. A Watcher in another town is a cousin visiting.

There is no chapter-house circuit. The "order" meets, when it meets, because Turning-Week gathers people who already keep the same night. What looks like organisation from the outside is architecture: the house that never took a warden's lintel; the beam that was turned to the stone when the chapel was re-floored; the room under the nave where the Night Watch leaves its coats. The First Seat knows those rooms exist. It grew over them. It does not inventory them, except in Threnmaieth, where inventory is the local weather.

Who may keep the watch

Not by Kind. A Kitsune hearth-child and a human neighbour keep the same night if they will sit it and speak accurately.

By practice first. You are of the house when you keep the Night Watch and teach a child the withheld blessing. Orthopraxy, older than the Motherfaith's: the withheld word is the dissent; the standing-at-the-Tree is the belonging.

The schism walks in. A Masked Watcher will stand for the Tender's blessing and add the withheld line under it — they are the ones a mixed town barely notices. A Bare Tree Watcher will not say she at all. Both may Second-read. They will not always Second-read the same. That is the house arguing with itself in the square, which is allowed, and is why they cannot present a single rival authority even if they wanted one.

Condition leans, not Condition-gates.

Act	Often	Why the Tithe (or the lack) fits	Also, and welcome
Night Watch	anyone of the house	the night does not care what you carry	the Kept, who were seen as whole; the Struck, who were seen at a harder door
Second Reading	Long-Lived	incorruptible memory of how a rare fall looked last time	a sharp Kept; a Stilled who will describe without flinching; a Wide-Hand Struck who has seen a threshold-colour from the other side
Keeping an old room	families that never took a lintel	the archaeology is inherited	a new household that refuses the warden's mark

The feared-licensed are not barred. A Stilled Second-reader is a civic comfort (the gaze holds a room still for accurate speech) and a pilgrimage fright; they are rarer at the sacred centre than in an old district that never stopped being Haelthael. A Phoenix is not clergy here either. They are a seeing no one in the square is ready to describe twice.

Struck Watchers must still be vouched anew like any Struck. The old rooms are not a hiding-place from that seam.

How they live with the other houses

House	Everyday arrangement	The hard edge
the Tree-Wardens	Same Tree, two blessings. Second reading alongside, not over.	Threnmaieth wants one name on the Threnhael. A Speaker who lets the withheld line stand is a column the crown can count. Two authoritative Speakers in one square is a fight.
the Fair Hand	Rarely share a square. A Settler hears “what falls, was seen” as a clause with no number.	Almost none, until a Bound wants a second reading of an oath-day and a Watcher will not call it a signing.
the Old Ways	Two old memories, opposite edges. A Watcher remembers a Before at the Tree; a door-keeper remembers a Before without one.	They would not agree if you sat them down.
the Open Table	Almost no contact. A Watcher who crossed the storm-wall would be a guest at supper, and would find the night already kept — for a different reason.	None that matters. There is no Night Watch on Kumbaan.

How they live in the three corners

- Vaethorn (the night-kin). Cousin-dissent. Thin reach, hot faith: a Watcher household is unusual and not hunted. The Night Watch looks, from a Hands-folk hearth, like extra piety. The withheld Mother-name is the only sting, and a Guest-reading town has larger fights (the grove) than this one.
- Lestrand (vigil-folk, when named). Rarely met. A Watcher on the docks is a scholar or a migrant from the core. The signing-watch does not need a second reading; the book is the second reading. Faith worn light enough that a withheld blessing is just another quay-sentence.
- Threnmaieth (the second column). The darkest pressure, and the house’s real weather. They are a known column on the roll — the Grown-Over, counted, not pogromed. The Night Watch is a festival-eve custom the crown can schedule. The second reading is tolerated until it contradicts the Speaker the Threnhael has already named. A Long-Lived who still has an un-recut lintel-copy is a person this house keeps.

The recut lintel

They remember a cost, and they have no institution that can keep a lintel from being turned to the stone.

The First Seat did not steal a throne from them. There was no throne. What was lost is quieter: a beam recut, a room under a chapel that is now a vestry, a second reading that remains alongside because the civic word was given to the warden when the Mother-name grew over the Seeing. All of that can be described as history. It is also a choice, still being made, about whose speech counts in the square.

Confirming the Leaf-Mother is real would not give the Watching a seat, and would not make the Grown-Over column kind. They have hold of the Before and the cost. They do not have the last word on a colour.

They do not walk a scion-queue. That injustice is the Orenhael's. Theirs is the recut beam.

Economy of the house

Almost none, as an institution. That is the point.

- Households keep the night. Bread from the same table. No stipend, no Cutting-leave, no pilgrimage-share.
- A Second-reader eats as a neighbour. Some old districts leave a plate at the room under the chapel during Turning-Week. That is courtesy, not a wage.
- Threnmaieth's tell. Being a column can become a living if a crown-clerk pays for a copied lintel or a listed name. A Watcher who takes that coin has not left the house. They have let the roll furnish it. The Bare Tree branch will not eat with them. The Masked will, and argue after.

The Nethoren are not the Tithe-infrastructure sector and not a safety-guild. They point no one at a licence. They describe a fall.

A second-reading slip

Written in a Watcher's own hand the morning after a mixed fall, and filed by a Threnmaieth Speaker under "alongside, not over." The Speaker's docket-mark is cleaner than the slip.

Storm-grey at the stem, lamp-amber at the serration, and the child did not flinch when the leaf turned. I will not say Two-Bodied. I will not say Answered. I will say what I saw: the Tree looked twice and did not choose the easier colour. The warden Spoke storm-grey. I sat beside and said the amber. Both were seen. File me as the second column if you must. Do not file the amber as an error.

On its face: a careful witness, a little stubborn, useful to a clerk who needs a dissent-name. The Speaker who filed it “alongside” was doing the peace. The roll that kept the slip was doing theology.

The Book-Hands

The working people of the Fair Hand. They have no seat and many tables. On Lestrand they are often the same people as commercial clerks; the faith is the profession, worn lightly. They do not rewrite a Bound’s Terms. That clause belongs to the Counterparty. They may witness an ask; they do not dictate.

Everyday: Book-hands, or Settlers. Liturgical: the Leddhael — LED-hayl — ledd “to reckon” + hael “whole”: those who keep the account fair enough that you can walk. Vaethorn’s second word is Bargainers’ clerks; Lestrand’s is the Settling-hands (ordinary, like saying notary); Threnmaieth files them with the house as the Uncounted Book — private books offend the crown.

In one sentence: they are notaries — hull in the morning, a child’s private book at Turning-Week — and the person who will help a Struck find a payable year (a hall, a warrant). They will recite a Bound’s Terms on oath-day. They will not change those Terms.

Shape of the order

- No seat, many tables. Guild-rooms and quay-shrines, not a college in anyone’s sacred wood. A “high house” in a rich port is the oldest book-room — age, not authority. The next quay has its own table and does not write to the first for leave.
- The faith is the profession. A Book-hand witnesses a signing, teaches a child to keep a book, and helps a Struck settle a year that can actually be lived. On Lestrand the same person may stamp a hull before noon and recite a Bound’s oath-day after. Doctrine is the ethic of the stamp: fair terms, then walk. They copy a Bound’s Terms. They do not author them.
- No membership roll. A roll of Book-hands would be a Threnhael in a clerk’s pocket. What makes you of the house is that you keep accounts honestly and will die to keep a crown-clerk out of a personal book.
- A settling-religion’s clerks, not contract-paladins. They do not ride. They do not hunt hidden terms as a knightly order. They sit at tables.

If you meet one

On Lestrand a Book-hand looks like a clerk. Ink-stained, a small stamp on a cord, a table in a guild-room or a quay-shrine the size of a pantry. Before noon they may witness a hull. After, a Bound’s oath-day. Same sentence both times: fair wind, fair term. You would not know which hour was “church” unless you already kept Leddoren.

Off the coast they are rarer and more obviously religious — the person a pilgrim-town sends for when a Struck cannot live this year (no hall, no one to stand), and the Hands-folk would rather walk them to a Tree.

They are useful the way a notary is useful. A port cannot live without someone who will stamp a signing. The faith is that the stamp and the becoming use the same grammar.

Who sits down, and when

Who	Why they come	What the Book-hand does	What they will not do
A ten-year-old's Settler household, Turning-Week	The child Turned (or was Kept); the personal book must open	Stand as witness , not petitioner. Speak the signing-watch line if they speak. Enter colour (or the hug), Tithe, what the year owes. Put the book in the child's hands.	Will not speak the Tender's blessing. Will not call the colour a gift. Will not Speak the civic name — the warden does that; they copy what was seen into a private book.
Anyone with a contract	Marriage, hull, a year's closing	Witness, copy, stamp, date.	Will not hide a clause. Hidden terms are the house's one sin. Will not show a personal book to a crown-clerk.
A Bound, on oath-day	The year's Terms must be spoken where a neighbour can hear	Recite the Terms as already written . Mark the civic book closed if the Tithe-year was paid, or owing if it was not.	Will not rewrite the Terms. That is the Counterparty's clause, not a clerk's. Will not pretend a stamp can ease a Pledge.
A Bound who wants the clause changed	The Terms are killing them; they have heard a clerk can "fix it"	A Counterparty Book-hand may sit a petition-watch : they witness the ask, keep the book open, and wait. If something answers, they copy what was answered. A Book Alone hand will not sit that hour — they do not believe anyone is across the table.	Will not dictate a new clause. Will not sell an easing. Anyone who claims they can is a liar, or someone taking coin in a cellar.
A Struck who is not Bound	They Changed later (drowned, died, taken); this town cannot house the Tithe	Civic settling: find a payable year — passage to a hall that exists, a warrant, someone to stand for them.	Will not take them to a Tree to be acknowledged as Given. Will not name them kin at a door. Will not rewrite a Bound contract under this heading.

Who	Why they come	What the Book-hand does	What they will not do
A child of the house, about nine	They must learn to keep a book before they Turn	Sit with a blank personal book: colour, Tithe, debts, what the year owes you. Private. Not the Threnhael.	Will not let a Reckoned clerk “help” copy it. Will not teach the book as a census.
A Tithe-poor Settler	The year will not close; they cannot stamp a fee	Some stay and rewrite until the candle dies. Some mark owing faster. Both are of the house.	Will not furnish a venting-hall or a greens-share. They may write a term that assumes one . The Hall-Keepers and Greens-Keepers own the hall and the lot.

An ordinary week on Lestrand

Morning — the commercial table. Hulls, marriages, copies, a deathless house’s instrument. Paid by the stamp. A Kept clerk (Lestrand’s free) may do only this and still be of the house if they keep accounts honestly and will die to keep a crown-clerk out of a personal book.

Turning-Week and oath-days — the signing-watch. They attend the Leaf-Fall as witnesses. They do not officiate. They stand at the edge of the square with a child’s first book and wait for a colour they can enter. A Bound’s oath-day is the high holy day: Terms recited in a voice the quay can hear, the year’s book closed or marked owing.

When someone Changed last week — civic settling, not a rewritten god-clause. A drowning came back Far-Voiced in a town with no ael-hall. A death came back Returned with a purpose the street will not house. The Book-hand finds a year that can be paid — passage, a warrant, a neighbour who will stand. If no one will stand, they write owing. The quay steps around. That is still the house’s kindness and its cruelty. It is not a Bound’s Terms being edited.

A Bound’s oath-day. They recite what was already sworn. They do not improve it. A Bound who wants the clause itself changed is asking the Counterparty, not the clerk. The honest house will witness the ask or refuse to pretend. Anyone selling a new clause after the lamps is another table.

They never write the word gift, even as a loan. A first-year apprentice who copies vael into a personal book is made to strike it and write grant. No one calls this a rule. It is how the ink goes.

They do not cut grafts, tend Trees, or carry scions. A sickening Tree is a warden’s crisis and a door-keeper’s fight. A Book-hand will write the delay into a contract.

There is no Speaker-equivalent. If two Book-hands disagree on a clause, they write both readings and date them. That is not a schism. That is a book.

How civic settling actually runs

This is for a Struck whose Tithe cannot be lived here. It is not for a Bound's supernatural Terms.

1. The Struck sits. The Book-hand names what is already true: you carry a voice; you carry a purpose.
2. They name what cannot be paid here: a hall that is not in this town; a warmth no one will give.
3. They find a year a neighbour can see being paid — passage to a release-house, a warrant, a seventh day.
4. They find someone to stand for the person. The Book-hand is not themselves a pillar unless they are Bound, Long-Lived, or Far-Voiced.
5. If that fails: owing, not broken. The civic book stays open. The quay learns the name.

How a Bound petition-watch runs (if they sit it)

1. The Bound speaks the ask. The Book-hand writes the ask, not the answer.
2. They wait. They do not invent a clause to fill the silence.
3. If nothing answers, they close the hour. The old Terms still stand. The house was honest.
4. If something answers, they copy the new clause as heard. They do not improve the wording. They do not take a fee for “getting a better deal.”

A Book Alone hand stops at step 1 and sends the Bound home. They will not play at a table they believe is empty. That is also honest.

What they carry

A stamp (personal, not a guild-licence — the ticket is a different paper). Ink. A cord-knife for striking a line. The small personal books they sell or gift to children of the house — not the Threnhael; a clerk who confuses them has started a fight. On a Bound's oath-day, the year's working contract, read aloud — as written, not as improved.

A “high house” is a room with old copies and a better lamp. It is not a palace. The next quay does not write here for leave.

What they refuse

- They will not show a personal book to the crown. A campaign that subpoenas one is stealing a soul in their language.
- They will not call a Leaf-Fall a gift, and they will not retcon a Given child into a debtor. The book opens at the colour; it does not invent a storm.
- They will not ride out as contract-paladins or carry a scion. They sit.
- They will not keep a membership roll of Book-hands. A roll would be a Threnhael.
- They will not rewrite a Bound's Terms or sell an easing of a Pledge. The clerk is not the Counterparty.

Who may keep a table

Not by Kind. A Selkie quay-child and a human clerk hold the same stamp if they keep accounts honestly.

By practice first. You are taken as a hand — apprenticed at a table, confirmed when a quay has watched you through a year's closings and at least one signing-watch. What you privately believe about whether anyone sits across the table (Counterparty / Book Alone) is the schism, not the hiring test. Both branches refuse hidden terms. That is enough to share a desk.

Condition leans, not Condition-gates.

Act	Often	Why the Tithe (or the lack) fits	Also, and welcome
Witnessing / teaching	Bound	their book is a contract; the faith did not invent this, they made it legible	the Unbound who have closed a year and will teach the closing; a Kept clerk (Lestrand's free — no Tithe, no guild, the book is a choice)
Novation of the Struck	Bound; Wide-Hand Struck who settled	they have been on the far side of a bad term	a Far-Voiced who can make a feeling unfakeable at the table (the three pillars)
Oldest book-rooms	Long-Lived houses that endow a room	a century of fair copies is a high house	anyone the port still comes to

The feared-licensed are not barred. A Bound Book-hand is ordinary on Lestrand and a theological problem in the Motherwood. A Stilled at a table is rare and useful (the room holds still for the clause).

A Phoenix is not a clerk. There is no term that covers them.

Struck Book-hands must still be vouched anew. Civic settling is how the house helps that vouching — which is why the same kindness is also the lever. It still does not rewrite a Bound’s clause.

How they live with the other houses

House	Everyday arrangement	The hard edge
the Tree-Wardens	Leaf-Fall as festival and signing-watch. On Lestrand they share a square and ignore each other’s sentences.	Gift-language vs. debt-language over the same Bound soul. A Bound warden is the seam; a Bound Book-hand is the house at home.
the Watchers	Rarely share a square. “What falls, was seen” sounds, to a Settler, like a clause with no number.	A Bound who wants a second reading of an oath-day and a Watcher who will not call it a signing.
the Old Ways	A door-keeper names a Struck kin at the door that made them; a Book-hand settles the civic year at a table. Sometimes the same week, same person.	Which name goes first — kin, or payable year. Two courtesies, not a trial.
the Open Table	A Settler who sits a moon-feast twice has been called kin in a language with no book.	“No one is a stranger twice” is not a term. There is no Leddoren mission on Kumbaan.

How they live in the three corners

- Lestrand (the Settling-hands). Home weather. The faith is the profession. A high house is a proud old room on a rich quay; it is not a seat. Cutting-leave can be brokered by the same people who close books — that is Lestrand’s clergy-sin, and it belongs to the wardens’ fee, not to a Book-hand’s stamp, except when a clerk “helps” a waiting town write the delay. Market-fade wears vestments here: the Tithe-poor Settler who cannot close the book is still a person the rich city steps around.
- Vaethorn (Bargainers’ clerks). Suspect, useful, few. A Book-hand on the pilgrim edge is settling a Struck’s year in a land that would rather take them to a Tree to be acknowledged as Given. The Hands-folk will eat with them if the year comes out kind. A Narrow-Hand preacher will not.
- Threnmaieth (the Uncounted Book). Private books offend the crown. A personal ledger that is not the Threnhael is, to a Reckoned clerk, a second seeing the crown does not hold. Book-hands here work quietly, or not at all, or as commercial notaries who have learned not to say Leddoren on a docket.

The book that will not close

Grace is a closed book. That is the house's kindness, and its cruelty.

Every civic settling that saves a Struck who can pay is paid for, somewhere, by the Struck who cannot. The Book-hand sees one table. The quay sees a step-around.

Their other exposed edge is the Bound they cannot help. A clerk who will not rewrite Terms will watch someone walk down the quay looking for a cellar that will lie to them. That is honesty's cost. The shadow economy still exists; the lived face of illicit Tithe-supply is the Slide. They do not stamp, and they do not rewrite Terms.

Economy of the house

- The stamp is the living. On Lestrand a Book-hand is paid as a clerk is paid — by the signing, the copy, the year's closing. The faith does not take a cut of the Tithe.
- High houses endow rooms. Deathless money likes a fair copy that will outlive a hull. That is proximity-wealth, not a Condition-tithe, and it is why the oldest rooms sit on the richest quays.
- Civic settling is badly paid. The Struck who most need a hall and a warrant are the ones who can least stamp a fee. Some Book-hands stay until the candle dies. Some mark owing faster. Both are of the house.

They are not the Tithe-infrastructure sector and not a safety-guild. They may write a term that assumes a venting-hall or a greens-share. They do not furnish one.

A civic settling

Lestrand quay-hand, written the week after a drowning came back Far-Voiced and could not pay a singer's Tithe in a town that had no ael-hall. The verso has the old storm-terms of the year, struck through — not a Bound's clause.

Grant: the voice, already carried. Old term: a hall that is not here. New term: one honest outlet each seventh day at the release-house in Greyhull, passage stamped, warrant by M. Senn the hull-clerk. If the seventh day is missed, the book is owing, not broken. Walk, if you can walk. If you cannot, the quay will not call it a gift.

On its face: the house's kindness — a storm-book rewritten so a person can live. Underneath: the fade confessing itself. "The quay will not call it a gift" is honest and is also the step-around, sacralized. Greyhull's release-house will take the seventh day. The eighth week the passage-money fails, the slip will still be fair, and the person will still be a book that would not close.

The Door-Keepers

The working people of the Old Ways. They have no seat because the land is the seat. Not a hierarchy; a reputation.

Everyday: door-keepers, also Kin-speakers. Liturgical: the Vaelbren — VAYL-bren — vael in the older sense ("what the land yields") + bren "hearth": those who keep the yield at the hearth. Vaethorn's second word is the door-folk (or Before-speakers when the fight is hot); Lestrang's is grove-talkers (a frontier curiosity); Threnmaeth files them with the house as the Unreached.

In one sentence: they are the person three valleys walk to when someone needs to know which drowning-pool still returns, which grove still takes people in — and the mouth that names a Struck kin at the door that made them, instead of walking them to a Tree to be filed as late.

Shape of the order

- The land is the seat. The Old Ways cannot have a mother-church. A hill, a drowning-stone, a grove, an oath-rock — these are the offices. A person is of the house when three valleys will walk to them, not when a college confirms them.
- Two jobs, often one mouth. A door-keeper knows which doors still open and will walk them at the year's hinges. A Kin-speaker speaks at ancestor-meals and names a Struck kin at the door that made them. In a thin-reach district this is one tired person. In a Guest-reading town that finally got a Tree, the two jobs may split for a generation and fold again when the old one dies.
- No Road-hand, no queue, no Speaking. They do not carry scions. They do not confirm colours. They do not authorise a cut. When a graft sickens in an old green, they argue host, not horticulture. The Road-hands already walk the other job.
- A land-and-kin house, not a druid-chapter. They do not police the Mother-name. Many also bring a child to a healthy graft.

If you meet one

A door-keeper looks like someone who knows the district. Mud on the hem, a worn token at the belt (river-stone, grove-twigg, a pinch of hill in a twist of cloth — no two alike), a sack that is sometimes food for a door and sometimes food for a meal. You would miss them as clergy if you came from Maiethorn looking for a chapel. You would find them if you asked who still walks the drowning-stone or who will speak at the board for the ones in the ground.

They are useful the way a midwife is useful, except the birth they attend is a later becoming, and the map they keep is which doors still open. A thin-reach town can live without a warden for a generation. It cannot live long without someone who remembers the water.

Who sends for them, and when

Who	Why they come	What the door-keeper does	What they will not do
Anyone in the district, at a year's hinge	The doors must be walked — Deep Solstice, the equinoxes, High Solstice, and the local hinges the map does not print	Walk. Greet water, hill, stone, in that order. Leave food. Ask to be known , not Given. Take the young one who carried last year.	Will not ask the door for a colour. Will not skip a door because a Tree is healthier this year.
A household at an ancestor-meal	Someone must know the names and keep the empty place	Speak the names. Set the place. Not let a guest sit in it. Eat. Argue Guest/First after the dishes if they argue.	Will not treat the empty place as a Returned's chair. Different door. Will not make this a chapel service.
A Struck, or the people who found them	They Changed at a river, a grove, an oath-stone, a death; the town wants them vouched or gone	Take them back to the door that made them — if it can be found — and name them kin . Feed them. Walk with them if the town will not house them.	Will not walk them to a Tree to be acknowledged as Given (the warden may do that the same week; the fight is which name goes first). Will not settle a civic year (that is a Book-hand). Cannot be a civic pillar unless they themselves are Long-Lived, Bound, or Far-Voiced.
A warden or a Road-hand	A graft in an old green is sickening; someone has Cutting-leave	Tend the wood as host or as keeper of a guest. Demand the meal before a second cut.	Will not carry the next scion up the road. Will not sell a cut. Will not call the Struck "unreached."
A scholar, a Lestrand clerk, a curious pilgrim	They want the older sense of vael , or a drowning-stone found	Show the door. Use the old word for a harvest and a returned child.	Will not give them a map of every door. Some doors are walked, not published.

An ordinary season

Most weeks. Someone asks whether the pool below the ford still returns. The door-keeper goes and looks. They know which grove took someone in ten years ago and whether that hill is still a door. They carry food when the hinge is close. They have a day life — ranging, green-tending, a stall — and the reputation sits on top of it. A famous one is just the one three valleys will walk to. A young one is the apprentice who carried the food last year and was watched doing it.

The year's hinges. Not only High Solstice / Turning-Week. Deep Solstice (the long night, the low year). The two equinoxes. Local hinges a Maiethorn calendar does not print — the first flood, the night the hill-ice breaks. They walk the old doors of the district. Water, then hill, then stone. They will not say why that order. A guest who reverses it is corrected without a sermon.

The meal. A place at the board for the ones in the ground. Quiet, domestic. The Kin-speaker is the one who knows the names. In a thin-reach district this is the same tired person who walked the ford at dawn.

When someone Changed later. They do not start at the Tree. They start at the door — the river if it was water, the grove if it was green, the oath-stone if it was a vow, the death-place if it was unfinished work. They name the person kin. The Motherfaith's quiet receiving-rite may happen the same week. A Book-hand's novation may happen the same month. Three courtesies, not a trial. The exposed edge is the Struck the town will not house: the door-keeper has a name to give and not a pillar. They may spend a season walking with one person. They may not be able to.

They tend a healthy graft as a guest in the grove if the town has one. They may Turn under it. They may not pretend it invented becoming.

How a kin-naming actually runs

1. Find the door, if it can be found. If it cannot, the nearest old door of the same kind — water for a drowning, green for a taking. A door that is only a Tree is a last resort, and a First-reading walker will hate it.
2. Food first. The door is greeted. The person is not tested with a colour.
3. The Kin-speaker says the name they already had, then the kin-name the door is owed. No leaf. No stamp. The token at the belt is shown, not given — unless this person will walk next year, in which case they will find their own.
4. The town, if it is watching, still wants a warrant to let them stay. The kin-name is courtesy. Standing-for is civic. A door-keeper who is also Long-Lived, Bound, or Far-Voiced can do both. Most cannot.

The contested grove

An ailing graft in an old Taken-In green is the signature fight: warden vs. door-keeper, guest vs. host, pilgrimage-scarcity vs. “we had ways.” Neighbours who both love the wood.

What they do with their hands is the same as the warden for an hour: water, watch blight, sit up with mortal wood. The argument is not horticulture. It is whether this Tree is a guest in the grove or a Tree the town failed. A Guest-reading Kin-speaker will pilgrimage and walk the doors, and will tend a dying graft as kin. A First-reading door-keeper will tend the same graft as a guest in their house and still refuse the Tender’s blessing. Both revere the Struck and the Taken-In. A reading that starts pitying them as “unreached” has already become Motherfaith.

If a Road-hand arrives with Cutting-leave, the door-keeper’s job is the meal first, then the question does this grove receive a guest? — not shall I have brought the wood myself? They do not carry scions.

What they carry

The token from their door — river-stone, grove-twigg, a pinch of hill. Food for the walk. Names in the head (the ones in the ground; the doors that still open). No stamp. No colour-book. No Cutting-leave.

What they refuse

- They will not confirm a colour or officiate a Leaf-Fall. If they bring a child to a healthy graft, the warden Speaks.
- They will not carry a scion or sell a cut.
- They will not call the Struck or the Taken-In “unreached.” That word is Motherfaith leaking in.
- They will not publish every door. Some are walked, not mapped.
- They will not become undeath-priests. Ancestor-meals are kin in the ground. The Returned are a different door.

Who may keep a door

Not by Kind. A Tengu ridge-child and a human neighbour walk the same stone if they know it and will stand for kin. The Taken-In are revered here; they are not a membership test.

By practice first. You are taken as a walker — you carried the food, you were watched at a meal, three households will send for you. Belief about the Mother (Guest / First) is secondary. Many Kin-speakers also bring a child to a healthy graft when they can reach one.

Condition leans, not Condition-gates.

Act	Often	Why the Tithe (or the lack) fits	Also, and welcome
Walking the doors	the Taken-In	the grove's own children; green Tithe + old green	Two-Bodied (the walk is a ranging); Kept for whom a closed door was weather, not a slight
Naming the Struck kin	Struck door-keepers	they have been through a door with no warden	a Wide-Hand warden who will share the week; a Bound whose oath-stone is the door
Ancestor-meals	anyone of the house	the dead stay in the ground — not the Returned's door	a Returned guest is a different door; the Kin-speaker is not their priest

The feared-licensed are not barred. A Taken-In door-keeper is ordinary on Heskoren and a frontier embarrassment in a Narrow-Hand sermon. A Phoenix is not a walker. There is no old door that answers to white-fire.

Struck door-keepers must still be vouched anew. Naming them kin is the house's answer to that seam — courtesy, not a substitute for the three pillars. The town may still want a warrant.

How they live with the other houses

House	Everyday arrangement	The hard edge
the Tree-Wardens	A healthy graft is a guest. Guest-reading Kin-speakers pilgrimage and walk the doors. Vaethorn's Hands-folk find the missing seat infuriating and, in a dry year, quietly useful.	A sickening Tree in an old grove: who is host. A Narrow-Hand preacher calling the Struck "not hers" is who they will not eat with.
the Watchers	Two old memories, opposite edges. Before at the Tree / Before without one.	They would not agree if you sat them down.
the Book-Hands	Kin-name and rewritten terms, sometimes the same Struck, same month.	Which name goes first. Two courtesies, not a trial.
the Open Table	Ancestor-meals and a place set for staying-kin look, to a traveller, like cousins. They are not. The dead in the ground are not the unseen hands.	The isle is not a grove. There is no Vaeloren mission on Kumbaan.

How they live in the three corners

- Vaethorn (the door-folk). Home weather, and the live fight. The warden is most of the state; the door-keeper is the older state the land still keeps. Guest-reading towns that finally got a Tree did not throw their grandparents out of the rite — they pilgrimage and walk. First-reading districts still waiting on a scion that will not take tend a dying guest and refuse the blessing. Vaethorn's guilt-theology (scarcity read as unworthiness) is the enemy, not the Hands-folk hearth. A closed door is weather.
- Lestrand (grove-talkers). A frontier curiosity. A door-keeper on the docks is a migrant or a story. The Settling will stamp a Struck's terms and call the kin-name poetry. Useful, if someone needs a drowning-stone found. Not a rival for the quay.
- Threnmaieth (the Unreached). Filed as a gap: people who were not at a proper Tree, doors the roll cannot name. A Kin-speaker in the core is rare and interesting to a crown-archivist. The census wants a column. The land is not a column. Pressure, not a hunt.

The host of a dying guest

Someone decides whether a sickening graft is a guest in the grove or a Tree the town failed.

The Road-hand arrives with leave and soil-science. The door-keeper arrives with grandparents and food. Both can be right about the wood. The years the grove spends arguing are years children walk to a neighbour's canopy — Kept-heavy, Struck-heavy — which the frontier already knows as weather, and which Vaethorn will sanctify as unworthiness if no one says otherwise.

This is not a queue. The Seat's scion-queue is the Orenhael's injustice. Theirs is who is host, and who will stand for the Struck the town will not. Confirming the Leaf-Mother is real would not make the grafts first, and would not make a closed door a slight. The grievance stays: the grafts are late; the Motherfaith did talk as if becoming were new.

Economy of the house

- Meals and walking. A door-keeper eats at the boards they speak for. No stipend from a seat. A famous one is housed because three valleys would be ashamed not to.
- No Cutting-leave, no fee. They do not sell wood. If a Guest-reading town wants a scion, that coin goes to the Seat, not to the Kin-speaker. A First-reading district that pays a Cutting-leave and still refuses the blessing is doing both courtesies at once, and will argue about it after.
- Standing for the Struck is unpaid. The ones who most need a kin-name are the ones a town will not house. Some door-keepers spend a year on one person. Some cannot. Both are of the house.

They are not the Tithe-infrastructure sector. Garden-commons and ranging-commons live there. A Taken-In door-keeper may live in a green. They do not licence it.

In an old Taken-In green, the week a Road-hand's cart was seen at the ford. Two hands; one knife-cut for the string.

The tree is young. The grove is not. We have fed it as a guest and we will feed it still. If you have come with leave, come to the meal first. If you have come with a second cut in mind, know that the hill already yielded a child this year and does not owe you a colour. We will not let either wood pretend it was first.

On its face: frontier courtesy, a little barbed — the drowning-stone saying reused as a note on a trunk. The Road-hand who eats first will plant as a guest. The one who cuts without the meal will be remembered as a claiming, and the wood may still take.

The Table-Keepers

The working people of the Open Table — hill-hosts on Kumbaan. They are almost not clergy. A Yumboe abroad keeping an attic is how the faith travels, rarely. The storm-shore is a different isle job: the Shore-Sitters.

Mainland everyday: table-keepers, also hill-hosts. Own-name: the Njaalo — NJAH-lo — a Yumboe coinage in the night-keeping tongue, “the hall that is kept.” Not Maiethren; this house owes the liturgy nothing. Sailors say moon-hosts. Vaethorn has them as a sailor's tale. Lestrاند says the Moon-Feast people when a quay wants a story. Threnmaieth does not file them — they are off the map.

In one sentence: they are the person who opens the hall (or the attic) and lays an extra place — on Kumbaan that is how a valley eats and how a stranger becomes kin; on the mainland it is one room, one supper, and a sentence the quay will not enforce.

Shape of the order

- Almost not an order. Ndeyaan has no chapel, no college, no colour-authority, no graft, no book, no door-walk that wants a title. The person whose hall the valley comes to on the bright nights is a table-keeper. Reputation, not office. When they die, the valley comes to the next hall that still sets the extra place.

- One job. Keep the table. Lay the extra place. Say, on the second sitting, no one is a stranger twice. That is the whole lintel. There is no second office to promote into.
- No seat across the sea, no mission. A Yumboe who wants a hill-hall on Strandoren keeps Ndeyaan in whatever room they have. They do not send for a scion, a stamp, or a Night Watch. The mainland does not send wardens to Kumbaan. The storm-wall is the boundary.
- A hospitality-house, not a fairy-bargain and not a Kind-guild. The unseen hands are furniture, not a geas. A human who has sat twice and will lay the place is of the table. A Yumboe who will not is just a neighbour who sleeps through the bright night. Recruits by faith, not by Kind.

If you meet one

On Kumbaan a table-keeper looks like the person whose hill-hall the valley already knows. Small, pearl-pale, silver-haired if they are Yumboe (most are, because that is who lives there). They open the door on the bright nights. By mainland noon they are often asleep. You would not call them a priest. You would go to their hall when the moon is up because that is where the food is and where a stranger is allowed to sit.

On the mainland they look like one person in a rented room who still sets a place no body will use. A sailor finds them by asking for the Moon-Feast. A clerk finds them by following a rumour and then files them as a guest. They cook. They pour. They say the sentence on the second night.

They are useful the way a host is useful. They do not water Trees, stamp books, or walk drowning-stones. If you came for those jobs you have the wrong house.

Who comes, and when

Who	Why they come	What the table-keeper does	What they will not do
The valley, on a bright night (Kumbaen)	The moon is up; the hall is where you eat	Open the hall. Lay the extra place slightly back from the board , not at the end. Let the unseen hands fetch and pour. Sing. Sleep when the moon is down.	Will not read a colour. Will not test a guest. Will not omit the extra place.
A stranger who crossed the storm-wall	They have already been through drowning-water; they need a seat	First night: guest (already sacred). Feed them. Learn a name if they offer one. Second night: say no one is a stranger twice and treat them as of the table.	Will not make them Turn. Will not ask what they are . Will not sell the sentence as a proverb.
Anyone at an ordinary supper	The extra place is every meal that matters, not only the feast	Set it. A poor house still sets it. The hands make the extra possible.	Will not count the household as the bodies you can see. That is the one impiety.
A guest on the mainland (attic)	They heard of a Moon-Feast; they are hungry; they are curious	Same two sittings, smaller room. Feed them. Say the sentence on the second night. Treat them as kin inside the room .	Will not walk them to a warden to be filed as belonging. Will not stamp a book. Will not collect for a hall across the water.
A rare Struck on the isle	A drowning, a death, a green taking — uncommon enough to be family news	Feed them. Keep them in the household. Do not make a class of them.	Will not invent a mainland receiving-rite. Will not send them to a Tree that is not there.
A warden, a Book-hand, a Watcher who crossed	Courtesy, curiosity	They are a guest. First night, second night. The host will find their noon-faith loud .	Will not give them a Tree to tend, a book to stamp, or a Night Watch to keep. There is nothing here for those jobs.

A bright night on Kumbaan

Dusk. The table-keeper opens the hill-hall — often because it was their grandmother's, often because it was the only roof that still fitted the crowd. People arrive as the moon clears the Paps. The extra place is already set, slightly back, a little apart. The unseen hands begin to fetch and pour; you can see the cups move. Songs. No colour-reading. No terms recited. A Staying host says the dead's names when they fill that place. A Serving host does not, and still fills it.

The table-keeper's work in the hour: open, set, greet, keep the extra place from being used as a spare stool, send a child for more bread if the hands have not already gone, say the sentence if someone is sitting their second night. When the moon goes down they sleep. Daylight is not a fallen hour. It is the Sabbath of sleep.

They do not confirm becoming. There is no Leaf-Fall on the isle. They do not vouch a Struck in the mainland sense; Struck are rare enough to be a family matter, not a class. They do not licence, graft, or file.

An ordinary supper

The extra place is not only feast-furniture. A poor house lays it on a quiet night. To omit it is the one real impiety — not because the staying starve (they do not) but because you have counted the household too small. The hands make this possible. That is not a metaphor they use. It is why a table-keeper can host beyond their means without becoming a Tithe-charity.

A child of the house learns the work by carrying dishes and by being told not to sit in the extra place. That is the apprenticeship. There is no Seat to confirm it.

An attic on Lestrand

A Yumboe on the mainland is a table-keeper by necessity. Morning (their night-end): they may work a quay kitchen, mend, copy — rent in the local coin. Evening: they lay the extra place in a room that fits four. Someone climbs the stair. First night they are a guest. Second night the host says the sentence and means it. The quay will not file the guest as a citizen. The host will still set them a place the third night.

This is how the faith travels, when it travels at all. It does not travel as a mission. There is no Njaalo chapter-house, no collection, no Road-hand of the moon. A second Yumboe in the same city may share a supper and not share a roof. Both are of the table. A mainlander who has sat twice and opened their own room is of the table too.

The second sitting

The first night you are a guest (and a guest is already sacred). The second, you are of the table. On Kumbaan this is how a stranger becomes kin — nearly law, in all but parchment. On the mainland this collides with citizenship-by-witness: you belong because your town watched you Turn, not because you ate twice.

A table-keeper who treats the second supper as belonging is doing their faith honestly. A warden who smiles and files them as a guest is doing theirs. Neither is a villain. The sentence does not cross the storm-wall intact. The host's job, abroad, is to keep the sentence inside the room and not pretend the clerk will honour it.

What they carry

An extra plate. Songs. The sentence. On the isle, a hall (inherited, or the one that still fits). On the mainland, rent and whatever the room will hold. No stamp. No token from a land-door. No colour-scrap. No Cutting-leave.

The extra place is set slightly back from the board, not at the end. A mainlander who puts it at the foot “for a servant” is corrected. No sermon. The plate is moved.

What they refuse

- They will not read a colour, tend a Tree, or keep a Night Watch.
- They will not turn the sentence into a Fair Hand term or a geas. Eat, and be the household — not sign, and owe.
- They will not test a guest. The storm-wall already did.
- They will not send a mission, collect for a hall across the water, or plant a Moon-Feast chapter in Vaethorn.
- They will not omit the extra place to look poorer or more devout. That is the one impiety.

Who may keep a table

Not by Kind. A mainlander who sits once is a guest; who sits twice is kin. A human, a Selkie, a Kitsune who will lay the extra place is of the Njaalo. A Yumboe who will not is not. There is no good-people-only order.

By practice first. You are a table-keeper when the valley (or the attic-stair) comes to you, and you set the place. There is no apprenticeship confirmed by a Seat. A child who has carried dishes on the bright nights is being watched. A mainland convert who has sat twice and opened their own room is being watched by whoever they fed.

The schism does the dishes. A Staying host will say the dead's names. A Serving host will not, and will call the hands the hill's own courtesy. Both set the extra place. Both pass the same cup. The argument is for after.

Condition leans, not Condition-gates — and on Kumba, barely a lean.

Act	Often	Why	Also, and welcome
Hill-hall on the isle	whoever inherited the hall	no Given Conditions on Kumba; Kind is Yumbeo because that is who lives there , not because the order requires it	a rare Struck who still hosts; a mainlander who stayed after the second sitting
Attic on the mainland	a Yumbeo abroad (by necessity)	they are still keeping Ndeyaan with whatever table they can make	a mainland convert who sat twice; a Kept clerk who likes the night better than the Tree
Laying the extra place	anyone of the table	the one impiety is omitting it	the poor house as much as the deep-hill hall

The feared-licensed are not barred and almost never arise on the isle. A Phoenix is not a host the Njaalo have a rite for. A Bound who sits twice is kin; their Terms are not a grace said over the plate.

Struck table-keepers on the mainland must still be vouched anew if they want to stay in a town. The second supper will not satisfy a Watchful clerk. That collision is the house's weather abroad, not a failure of hospitality.

How they live with the other houses

House	Everyday arrangement	The hard edge
the Tree-Wardens	Almost no contact. A warden who crosses the storm-wall is a guest at supper. There is no Tree to tend.	None that matters. No mission-chapter on Kumbaen. No moon-warden on the mainland.
the Watchers	A Watcher who crossed would find the night already kept — for a different reason.	No Night Watch on the isle.
the Book-Hands	A Settler who sits twice has been called kin in a language with no book.	Do not turn the sentence into a term.
the Door-Keepers	Ancestor-meals and a place set look like cousins to a traveller. They are not. The dead in the ground are not the unseen hands.	The isle is not a grove.
the Shore-Sitters	Sister house. They sit the storm-beach. A living wreck they walk uphill; they do not seat on the sand.	A Table-Keeper does not go down to wait. The sand decides alive ; the hall decides kin .

How they live in the three corners (and off the map)

The three-corner lever barely reaches here. That is the theology.

- Kumbaen (hill-hosts). Home weather. The Njaalo is just who opened the hall. The moon, not the solstice. Wholeness is the default. No queue, no roll, no book, no second reading.
- Lestrand (the Moon-Feast people). A quay-story. An attic-host is a curiosity and a good supper. “No one is a stranger twice” is printed, by sailors, as a proverb on a card. The Settling will not enforce it. The attic-host will, inside the room, and cannot outside it.
- Vaethorn (a sailor’s tale). Hot faith, thin reach: a table-keeper is a wonder if they ever arrive, and a test of Guest-reading courtesy. They will be fed. They will be asked about the Mother. They will not understand why a people need to be chosen in order to be wanted.
- Threnmaieth (off the map). Not on the roll. A Yumboe in the Sacred Core is a diplomatic incident of manners, not a column. The crown cannot file a people who were never at a Tree. That is a relief and a slight at once.

The sentence that will not travel

On Kumbaan, the second sitting is how you belong. On the mainland, you belong because a town watched you Turn.

A table-keeper abroad who treats the second supper as kin-making is not naive. They are keeping Ndeyaan. The warden, the clerk, the Book-hand who smiles and files them as a guest are not cruel. They are keeping their grammar. The sentence does not cross the storm-wall intact. Confirming the Leaf-Mother is real would not give the isle a Tree, and would not make “wanted” into a gift the good people were missing. Their claim — we were never lacking — stays. The injustice that can be played now is smaller and sharper: hospitality that is nearly law on one side of the water is a proverb on the other, and romanticizing the Moon-Feast is itself a slight.

They have no scion-queue. They have no novation-fade. They have no recut lintel. An attic-host is one person, analog supper, no authority outside the room.

Economy of the house

- The hall is the living. On Kumbaan a table-keeper is fed by the same feast they host. The unseen hands make a poor house’s extra place possible. There is no stipend, no Cutting-leave, no pilgrimage-share.
- An attic pays rent in the local coin. A Yumboe abroad works as anyone works. They are not a charity-order and not Tithe-infrastructure. They may cook for a quay. They do not furnish a venting-hall.
- No collection for a hall across the water. That would be a mission. There isn’t one.

A place-card

Badly copied by a Strandor sailor who did come back, and sold on a Lestrand quay as a dinner-grace. The verso is the sailor’s own hand: “for luck at second sitting.”

We have counted you. Sit. If you have a name we have not learned it yet; if you have a colour we have no tree to read it. The moon is enough light. Eat, and be the household. — and if you sit again, you are not a stranger. This is not a proverb. Do not sell it as one.

On its face: hospitality, almost twee, already half-ruined by the quay-copy. The last two lines are the table-keeper’s, added when she saw him copy the blessing; he sold them anyway. The card is how Lestrand files the Njaalo: a Moon-Feast story, lucky if you eat twice. The woman in the attic still sets the place.

The Shore-Sitters

A second Kumbaan house, flavor, not a mainland order. The Table-Keepers open the hall. These sit the storm-beaches. Almost no one reaches the isle; someone has to be there when the almost happens.

Everyday: shore-sitters, also wall-waiters. Own-name: Njawaal — njah-WAHL — a Yumboe coinage, “the sitting at the wall.” Not Maiethren. Table-keepers call them the first night, half a joke: a wreck is not yet kin.

In one sentence: they sit the storm-shore with their back to the hill-hall and wait — they do not swim the wall, they do not test anyone with a colour, and if someone is still breathing they walk them uphill to a table.

If you meet one

A small person on a bad beach, lamp hooded so it does not call ships in. They look like they have been there a long time. They will not wade. They will take a living mainlander by the sleeve and start the path up. They will name a drowned body if the house leans Staying, or they will not, if it leans Serving, and they will still carry the body above the tide.

You would not call them a priest. You would find them if you asked who sits the black sand when the wall is loud.

What they actually do

- Sit. Storm nights, wreck-moons, the weeks after a crossing rumor. One person per stretch if the coast is kept at all. Reputation, not a roster.
- Receive. Living: water, a blanket, no questions about Kind or colour. Dead: above the tide. Cargo: what the hall can use. They do not loot for a market. There is no quay.
- Hand uphill. The living go to a table-keeper. First night as guest starts at the hall, not on the sand — but the shore-sitter is why there was a first night.
- Refuse the wall. They do not swim out. They do not keep a boat for rescue. The wall is not a door they walk. A mainlander who asks why didn't you come for me sooner is told we do not call the sea. We wait.

They do not keep the extra place (that is the hall). They do not Speak, stamp, or walk old mainland doors. They do not send anyone back across.

Who comes

Almost no one. That is the theology. A shore-sitter's year may be empty. The job is still to sit. When someone does come, the whole valley hears it as news, not as a shipping schedule.

How they sit with the table-keepers

Same faith, two jobs. The shore decides alive. The hall decides kin. A shore-sitter who starts laying the extra place on the sand has started doing the other house's work. A table-keeper who walks the black sand every storm has started doing this one. Both can happen in a thin year. Most years they are different people.

Said to a sailor who did come back

The night before he was walked uphill. Copied later as a quay-story, badly.

We did not fetch you. The wall does not owe you a hand. Sit until you can walk. If you walk, there is a hall. If you do not, we will still take you off the sand. Do not thank the sea. It was not kind. We were only here.

On its face: cold courtesy. The sailor heard a rescue. It was a wait.

The Slide

The lived face of illicit Tithe-supply — not a fifth faith, not clergy. They do not help you pay a Tithe. They own the moment you start to fail, and they make failure useful.

Everyday: the Slide, also week-keepers. Cant: the Vaethledd — VAYTH-led — vaeth “the waiting” + ledd “to reckon”: the waiting, reckoned. Vaethorn says the last pot (or gift-credit, when the commons have run out). Lestrand says week-rent the way it says landlord. Threnmaieth files nothing; the roll already has a counted hall. A clerk who knows will say the late week.

In one sentence: they rent you not falling — one week of green, one outlet, one new page — and they are never in a hurry to let you get free.

They do not rewrite Bound Terms, steal scions, or sell a false Turning-witness.

Shape of the house

- A practice, not a gang. There is no seat, no colour, no roster, no cellar liturgy. You are of the Slide when someone comes back next week. Reputation. When they die, the book of weeks goes to whoever still has a pot, a room, or a key.
- One job. Furnish just enough Tithe-supply that the person does not become a public hazard, and never enough that they recover. The product is the week. The price is remaining theirs.
- They think they are in a rent story. They do not call themselves monsters. They extend. They keep a book. They will tell you they kept someone whole. A kind face, a real key, a measured withhold later.
- Not clergy and not the official halls. They do not stamp books, Speak colours, walk old doors, or open a hill-hall. They do not run the town greenhouse, the counted ael-hall, or a licence-guild. Those wait. The guilds will pretend not to know these people. That pretending is already part of the town.

If you meet one

They look like a landlord. A cousin who still has a pot after the commons ran dry. A junior clerk at a deathless house who will extend a novelty subscription one more week. A person with a spare room and a voice who will let you cry there, for a price that is never quite coin.

You would not call them a priest. You would find them if you asked who still has green when the leaf-lot is closed.

They are useful the way a week is useful. If you came for a stamp, a colour, or a false childhood, you have the wrong house.

Who comes, and when

Who	Why they come	What the week-keeper does	What they will not do
A Taken-In cut off from land	The greens-queue is longer than the wilt	Rent a pot, a strip, a night on living dirt. Extend if the week cannot be paid.	Will not give them a commons-share that lasts. Will not walk them to a warden to be filed as housed.
A Far-Voiced who lost a stage	Isolated posting, dull labor, nowhere to vent; the Cry is close	A room, an hour, a door that shuts. One outlet. The next week is the same week.	Will not find them honest work. Will not let the Cry happen in the street — that brings the watch, and ruins the book.
A Long-Lived whose novelty has thinned	The endowment is late; the fade has started	A page, a letter, a gossip that is new enough . Rationed.	Will not endow a library. Will not be their deathless patron in public.
An Unbound losing warmth	Company costs; the hole is getting loud	Sit with them. Be known, a little. Charge the sitting.	Will not be family. Will not sign them a new Bargain — that is another table.
A Bound behind on civic coin	Rent, a guild fee, a year that will not close	Hold the debt. Extend. Use the hold.	Will not rewrite Terms. Money, not a clause. Will not sell a cellar-easing.
A Returned whose Purpose pays nothing	The work the dead want is not a trade	A week of keep so they can keep walking.	Will not furnish the Purpose. Will not send them to a plague-ward unless the ward pays them .
A family, before the town sees	A child or a parent is sliding; they will pay so the square does not	Take the week. Take the family's coin. Keep the person quiet .	Will not tell the warden. Will not make the slide a sermon.

An ordinary week

They extend first. That is the hook, and it is also what they believe about themselves. A person arrives already late. The week-keeper does not withhold on the first night. They open the lot, the room, the page. They write extended. They name a day.

The withhold comes later, and it is measured. Never enough to make a public hazard — a wilt in the square, a Cry in the market, a fade a neighbour can name — because that brings the watch, the guild, the counted hall, and the book dies. Never enough to let the person stand up and walk to a commons that would keep them. The asset is a person who is always almost whole.

They keep a book of weeks, not a ledger of coin. Coin is how some weeks are paid. The thing they are counting is how long you have not fallen, on their floor.

A child of the house learns the work by carrying water to the pots and by being told not to let a guest sleep a second week for nothing. There is no Seat to confirm it.

What they carry

A key. A pot, a spare room, a stack of pages that are new enough. A book of weeks. No stamp. No colour-scrap. No Cutting-leave. No false witness to sell in the square.

What they refuse

- They will not pretend to be clergy. No colour, no book-stamp, no door-walk, no extra place.
- They will not rewrite a Bound's Terms. They may hold a Bound's rent. That is money.
- They will not steal a scion or sell I watched you Turn.
- They will not push someone over the scary edge on purpose. A corpse, a public Cry, a wilt the town can see — that is a ruined week and a ruined name.
- They will not run a mission, a cellar-church, or a Kumbaan export. There is almost no Tithe on the isle to own.
- They will not call the week a gift. They will also not call it a cruelty. They call it a week.

Who may keep a week

Not by Kind. A human, a Kitsune, a Selkie, a Tengu who has a pot and a book can be of the Slide. A Yumboe abroad who has started charging for the extra place has started a different sin; send them back to the Table-Keepers.

By practice first. You are of the Slide when someone comes back next week, and you still have the key. There is no apprenticeship confirmed by anyone. A cousin who extended once and then let the person recover was kind. They are not of this house.

Condition leans, not Condition-gates.

Act	Often	Why	Also, and welcome
A pot, a strip, a night of dirt	a Taken-In who kept a private lot	they already furnish green	a Kept with a window-box and no Tithe of their own
A shut room, an hour of voice	a Far-Voiced with a spare hall	they already know what an outlet costs	a performer who lost the honest stage and kept the door
A page that is new enough	a Long-Lived clerk, a junior at a deathless house	novelty is already their weather	anyone who can still find a rumour the fade has not heard
The book of weeks itself	whoever can read a late face	the house is the count, not the crop	a Kept broker — unencumbered, can move, can carry the book to the next town

The feared-licensed are not barred. A Stilled who rents stillness-hours is rare and tightly watched. A Bound who holds civic debt is money, not a Counterparty.

How they live with the other houses

House	Everyday arrangement	The hard edge
the Tree-Wardens	Almost no contact. A warden furnishes a Tree, not a week.	A Road-hand is not a week-cart. A scion is not Tithe-pay.
the Watchers	A Watcher who sat an eve-vigil is not in this book.	They do not sell a false watch.
the Book-Hands	A Settler who marked owing has just made a customer. The clerk will watch them walk down the quay.	The Slide does not stamp. The clerk does not furnish. The Bound they cannot help is still not this house's Terms to rewrite.
the Door-Keepers	A Struck named kin at a door still has a Tithe. Kinship is not green.	A drowning-stone is not a rented lot.
the Table-Keepers	No contact that matters. The second sitting is not a week.	They do not charge for the extra place. That is a different faith's one impiety.
Official halls and greens	The official hall, the counted green, the licence. The town is glad someone "takes the late ones."	The guilds are the public good / the crown's channel / the posted market. The Slide is who they pretend not to know.

How they live in the three corners (and off the map)

- Vaethorn (the last pot). Home weather for the pious version. The commons ran out. A cousin still has a pot. They will say they are tending a gift. The quiet obligation is the week: you are helped, and you are theirs. Subsidy already shades into conscription in the Warm; this is that shade, private.
- Lestrand (week-rent). Ordinary. Posted, almost. A leaf-lot by the season is already the honest market. The Slide is the lot that will still open after the season-fee failed, at a price that is the next season. No sermon. A landlord.
- Threnmaith (the late week). The crown already holds Tithe. The Slide does not compete with the counted hall on ordinary days. They sell the week the hall is late, the extra green the roll does not cover, the novelty the archive will not release. They look like a clerk. The crown's injustice is cold and precise; this is the leak it cannot file without admitting the channel failed. The roll pretends not to know.
- Kumbaan. No. Almost no Given Tithes. A wreck walked uphill is a guest, not a debtor.

The week that will not end

Whoever furnishes a provided-for Tithe holds power over its bearer. The Slide is that lever with a face, and with a patience the official hall is not allowed.

The town is glad. A person who is quietly almost-falling is not a Cry in the market. The Warm can say the gift is still being tended. The Watchful can say the channel held. The quay can say the owing was marked and someone took them in.

Confirming the Leaf-Mother is real and kind does not make the week fair. She gave the need. She did not build the book of weeks.

They have no scion-queue. They have no novation. They have no sentence that will not travel. This house's constraint is the measured week — analog, one key, no authority except the one the Tithe gives them.

Off-book Bound brokerage and sold vouching still exist as nameless underside. They are not this house.

Economy of the house

- The week is the living. Paid in coin, in labor, in a favor, in a child sent to carry water. The book counts weeks first.
- They are not a charity-order and not Tithe-infrastructure. A town greenhouse, a counted ael-hall, an endowed long-house of books — those are the official sector. A week-keeper may sit next to all three and take the overflow.

- Deathless proximity. A junior at a long-house who rations novelty is how ossification feels at street level: not a century loan, a page at a time. The house does not run the bank.
- No collection for a hall across the water. There isn't one.

A week-slip

Lestrand leaf-lot, pinned inside a door that still opens after the season-fee has failed. The verso is the same slip, last week, the date scratched once.

One week of the lot. Extended. Do not let the pot dry. If you cannot come, send a child. The week is the same week. We do not call this a gift. We do not call it a debt. Come before the leaves turn. If you have already turned, come anyway.

On its face: a landlord being practical, almost kind. Underneath: the product is not falling, and the blindness the writer cannot afford — they think they refused the Mother's word. They also refused the word debt, which is how the book stays a book of weeks and never quite closes. "If you have already turned, come anyway" is the house's whole case: becoming did not save you from needing them. The child who carries water is learning the trade.

How People Live

Law and citizenship

You belong because your town saw you Turn.

Every child passes through their town Turning Tree in their tenth year, and the whole town is there to watch. The Leaf-Fall is the most-attended day of a community's year — kin, neighbours, the tree-wardens, all gathered. They see the leaf fall on a child, or see the Tree hug them.

So citizenship in the Turning is witnessed, not recorded. You are of a place because that place remembers you — it watched you become who you are.

There is no register of the people. No town, church, or crown keeps a list of everyone and their gift. That would be to hold a record on people, and it is not how this world works. Belonging is living communal memory, the way a real village knows its own — not a ledger. The one kingdom that does keep such a list is a notorious exception — Threnmaieth, the Tallied Crown — and it reads as unsettling precisely because no one else does it.

This is also a Hands-era default. In the Walking Years the town that saw you Turn was the crowd under Thaeloren — or no one, if you never arrived. Vouching-at-a-distance exists to carry that origin-witness home.

How you prove who you are — by people, not papers

The Turning never needed to invent the papers-and-registers state, because trust runs through people who cannot be faked.

You are known by witnesses, not documents. Common tongue: standing-for. Vaethorn calls it the speaking (vouched at worship). Lestrاند calls it warranting (a commercial guarantee). Threnmaieth calls it the naming (you are named to the crown).

- A Long-Lived remembers you — and their memory is incorruptible and runs back centuries.
- A Bound vouches for you — and a Bound's sworn word is literally binding, so a false vouch is not a lie they can cheaply tell.

- A Far-Voiced speaks for you — and their voice betrays real feeling under strain, so they cannot smoothly lie on your behalf.

To establish yourself in a new place is to be vouched into it — to acquire people who will stand for you. This is warmer and more human than an ID-check, and it has a sharp social consequence: the friendless and the rootless are the truly vulnerable, because they have no one to vouch. The law's exclusions fall not on “the undocumented” but on the unvouched — a person no one will stand for.

The Struck — those who changed unwitnessed

A Struck person acquired their Condition later, and alone — a drowning, a death, a sworn contract, long after their tenth-year Turning. The town watched everyone else become who they are. No one watched the Struck. They changed with no witnesses.

So a Struck person must be vouched anew — the community has to re-know them as what they've become, on the word of those who'll stand for them. That is the plain root of the old unease that the Struck are “a little suspect”: not (only) prejudice, but the simple fact that their becoming happened where no one could see it. A change everyone witnessed is trusted; a change that happened in the dark must be spoken for. Every polity has people whose transformation went unwitnessed, and every polity feels differently about that.

Two things make the seam sharper:

- The dangerous Struck arrive raw. A Struck Stilled or Far-Voiced manifests untrained, with the hazard already live and no guild to have caught it young. For these, being vouched-in is bound up with mandatory guild-intake — you are taken in hand and apprenticed at once, for everyone's safety, whether you wanted the vocation or not.
- Some doors are crimes-adjacent. The Bound are Struck by a sworn contract; the Returned by dying. To vouch a Bound into a community is to acknowledge a contract no one witnessed being sworn — which is why contract-law and the acceptance of the Bound are tangled together.

Vaethorn's second word for the Struck is the late-come (met at a later door). Lestrاند's is the turned (neutral, a fact). Threnmaieth's is the unwitnessed (suspect until named).

The Inviolate Will

Beneath all local variation sits a single principle so firm it functions as constitutional bedrock, and it is bedrock because it is true: no Condition can compel, control, or bend another person's will. Not the Bound's Whisper, not the Far-Voiced's Cry, not the Long-Lived's regard — every Condition's danger stops at property, at pain, at fear, at the edge of another's choosing. The law mirrors the metaphysics in a maxim taught to every child:

“The will is one’s own.”

Vaethorn holds it as the Mother’s own line (scripture). Lestrاند cites the free-will clause (sound commercial law). Threnmaieth cites the crown’s assurance (to justify the roll).

Its consequences are large:

- The horror-story fears are void in law. There is no such crime as “being mind-controlled by a vampire,” because it cannot happen. This is the legal floor under the world’s neighbours-not-monsters tone — the one thing that would make them un-neighbourly is impossible, and everyone knows it.
- It sorts the criminal code. Because a Condition can’t seize a will, harm done with one splits cleanly into two very different things: negligent Tithe-lapse (letting your element vent, your Cry break, your green go to seed — a regulatory or public-nuisance matter) versus willful weaponizing (deliberately turning a gift on someone — ordinary violent crime, no gentler for the instrument). In practice only the Stilled’s gaze even supports a true “you petrified a citizen” charge; most of what the law fears is negligence, not assault.
- It is the shield the feared hide behind. A Bound can point to the Inviolable Will and say, truthfully, my contract cannot make you do anything. Whether a given polity listens is exactly where they diverge.

The safety-licence — how hazard is regulated (and by whom)

The one place the law does attach to individuals is public safety — and it does so narrowly. Because every Condition carries a Tithe, there’s a natural hook: the handful of Conditions whose lapsed Tithe or lost temper can hurt bystanders are the only ones that require a licence to practice. The rule of thumb is consistent across the world: a licence attaches where a Condition is dangerous to others — never where it is merely powerful, and never as a way to keep track of people. It is the same logic by which any world licenses a few dangerous trades, not a census.

Common tongue: the ticket. Vaethorn: the blessing-to-practice. Lestrاند: the guild-ticket. Threnmaieth: the crown-warrant.

By that rule, only these need a licence — and it’s held by the person as a mark of competence, like a master’s ticket:

Licence weight	Condition	Why
Strictest	the Stilled	The one gaze that can hold a person still forever. Real oversight and a strict code — the model the others imitate.
Heavy, training-first	Far-Voiced, the Answered	A Cry in a crowded hall, an element “letting go” in a workshop — real bystander hazard, mastered by guild apprenticeship and scheduled outlets.
Contractual, not bodily	Bound	Overseen less for bodily hazard (the Whisper can’t command) than because a Bound is a walking legal instrument.
None	Two-Bodied (~18%), Long-Lived, Returned, and all the Kept	No bystander danger worth a licence. The great majority of the Conditioned carry nothing at all — they are simply neighbours.

Licences are guild-issued, not state-issued. A guild knows its own members the way any craft guild does; it isn’t a registry of the population, it’s a roster of practitioners of a dangerous art, kept by the art’s own masters. The state charters the guild and lets it police its own under threat of losing the charter. So the Stilled’s guild licenses stillers and the element-guilds channel the Answered, while the state watches the guild, not the individual. This diffuses power (no single authority holds the Conditioned) and breeds its own frictions: guilds guard monopolies, licences become property, and an unlicensed practitioner threatens the guild’s charter as much as the public’s safety.

The three pillars — why the Conditioned are the legal system

The deepest fact about Condition-law is that it is not law imposed on the Conditioned from outside — three Conditions are the legal apparatus itself, and they are exactly the people who make a register unnecessary:

- Long-Lived — incorruptible memory. The archivists, notaries, and judges; a matter of record is whatever they say they witnessed a century ago. Where documents would be forged, a Long-Lived simply remembers.
- Bound — binding word. A Bound’s sworn oath is literally binding and they hear a lie as it’s told, so they are the witnesses, oath-keepers, and debt-arbiters. When a treaty must truly hold, a Bound swears it.
- Far-Voiced — unfakeable feeling. Trusted as sworn witnesses precisely because their voice betrays real emotion under strain, so they cannot lie well on the stand.

Evidence and contract in the Turning are therefore made of people. Its late-medieval reaches trust — perfect memory, lie-heard oaths, unfakeable testimony — that other worlds needed paper bureaucracies (and centuries) to approximate, because here the machinery is alive and Given. A world with witnesses like these does not need to write everyone down — which is exactly why the one kingdom that insists on doing so looks so strange to everyone else.

Rights of the Kept

The Kept are the quiet centre of citizenship, and their legal position is best described as gloriously unremarkable. They were witnessed at their Turning like everyone; they carry no Tithe, need no licence, answer to no guild. In most polities the Kept are the default legal person — the frame the rest of the law is drawn around.

Vaethorn's second word is the Waited / Mother-kept (pitied — passed over). Lestrاند's is the free (approving — unencumbered labor). Threnmaieth's is the unmarked / the passed-over (noted as such).

Two wrinkles keep them from being a footnote:

- Kept status is not permanent immunity. About a third of the Kept are still Struck later. So a Kept person lives untithed and unlicensed but never wholly outside the safety system's reach — the day they're Struck, they too must be vouched anew. Legally, "Kept" describes your present, not a promise about your future.
- Where reverence for the gift runs hot, the Kept can be quietly pitied or pressured — treated as having "missed out," leaned on to explain why the Tree passed them over. This is a social harm the law rarely names, and it runs hardest in the most devout polities.

The Given keep their plain name everywhere. Vaethorn's second word is the gifted (blessed). Lestrاند's is the Given (plain). Threnmaieth's is the marked (on the roll).

Edge cases the law must hold

- The Hollow (the Unbound) raise a capacity and protective-status question. Freed from a contract but missing the Pledge they paid, an isolated Hollow is pulled to sign again. Kinder polities extend a protective status (a guardian, a claim on connection, a bar on presenting them fresh contracts); harsher ones leave them to the pull.
- The Given-Over (the "Forfeit") is the setting's sharpest legal wound: a Bound who kept re-signing until the counterparty effectively owns the person. This is a living case of legal personhood erased by accumulated contract — and the contract-guilds have a term of art for it precisely because the law has never fully decided at what point a person has bargained away enough of themselves to stop being one. A recurring, unresolved question rather than a settled rule.

- Phoenix is not a licensing problem at all — a single legendary person who cannot hide is a political problem (a symbol no ruler controls), handled by whoever currently wants to own or protect the one alive.

Three polity stances

The grammar above is universal; the tone is not. Variation comes from three independent axes every polity sets separately:

- Theology — how gift-devout is it? From ardent Motherfaith gift-integration (a Condition is a blessing, belonging is a birthright) through worn-lightly civic religion to frank secular pragmatism, and the odd local heresy. Sets how the Struck, the Kept, and the feared Conditions are read before the law even speaks.
- Reach — Tree-rich core or Tree-poor edge? Where healthy Trees stand, reach is full and the Given are dense; where Trees are few, young, or sickening, the population runs higher on the Kept and the Struck.
- Governance — how far does the state reach onto the person? From light guild self-rule (the world's warm default — the craft polices its own, the crown charters the guild) all the way to a crown that writes its subjects down. Sets how much the safety-hook becomes a surveillance-hook.

Three recurring points on these axes:

The Warm (high theology). Law flows straight from the Motherfaith's gift-theology: a Condition is a blessing, the Struck are vouched-in graciously as people the Mother met at a later door, licences are framed as helping you tend your gift rather than policing you. Warmest near the Awakening Tree. Its injustice is soft and hard to name: everyone is expected to serve their gift, so guild "vocation" shades into pressure, the Kept get pitied for missing out, and to decline your Condition's obvious use reads as ingratitude to the Mother herself.

The Watchful (governance turned to its extreme — a deliberate aberration). At the far end of the governance axis sits a crown that breaks the world's norm and does write its people down — a ruler who does not trust living memory and keeps a roster of every subject and their Condition. Note precisely what makes this aberrant: it is not that they keep written records at all — every polity has guild rolls, notarial acts, and tax ledgers — it is that they keep a census of persons and their gifts, a record held on people, which no one else does. Threnmaieth's census calls itself the Threnhael (THREN-hayl) — thren (sacred counting) + hael (whole, hale): "the keeping-whole." It sounds like care and is total surveillance. Its own clerks say they "keep the realm hale"; its subjects are "kept whole"; outsiders hear "the Counting." Framed at home as prudence and order; experienced as surveillance, because that is what it is. The unvouched are hunted, the Struck are pursued to be catalogued, Tithe-needs become points of leverage, and the Bound especially are watched far past their real hazard — pure stigma dressed as safety, since the Whisper can't command and the roster's clerks know it. A Watchful kingdom that is also devout and Tree-rich is the darkest corner of the whole space.

The Frontier (low reach). Far from any healthy Tree, where even witnessing is thin and custom outruns law. The giving thins where the Trees are thin, so these lands run higher on the Kept and higher on the Struck — more people the rite reached faintly or not at all. Freer in the good sense (no one asks for a licence; the Taken-In whom cities keep at arm's length are simply neighbours here, the backbone of the frontier economy) and lawless in the bad (unvouched Struck with no one to stand for them and no guild to train them, feared Conditions met with a rope rather than a licence). Reach and governance often drift together — a thin-reach edge tends to be thinly governed too — but they need not: a devout frontier and a lightly-governed core both exist.

Economy and the Tithe

In other worlds an economy is organized around producing what people want. In the Turning it is also organized around a thing no other world has: keeping three of every four people able to carry what they've become. Every Condition has a Tithe — an ongoing need that must be met or the scary edge shows. Multiply that by about three-quarters of the population and it stops being a private matter.

Tithe-provision is a permanent sector of the economy, as large and as load-bearing as food or fuel — greenhouses and venting-halls and ranging-commons the way other worlds build power plants and hospitals.

This is the plain answer to why society organizes around the Conditioned: not reverence, not fear, but infrastructure. A civilization where most people need something regular to stay whole builds around providing it — and the ones who provide it, and the ones who need it, are usually the same people.

Self-paying vs provided-for Tithes

The single most important economic fact is that not all Tithes cost the same to pay — and some don't cost anything at all, because paying them is doing useful work. This sorts the Conditioned along a spectrum from self-paying to provided-for, and almost everything else follows from where a Condition sits on it. It is a spectrum, not a wall — the most interesting cases sit on the seam, and which side a person lands on can depend on their vocation, not just their Condition.

Self-paying Tithes — the work is the payment. For several Conditions, the upkeep is discharged by doing exactly the labor society needs. These people are an economist's miracle: their maintenance cost and their productive output are the same act.

Condition	The Tithe	...paid by doing
the Answered	use the element in earnest	the craft itself — a Tide-Answered shipwright slakes the Tithe by building the ship
Two-Bodied	spend time as the animal	the ranging work — herding, rescue, courier, scout; being the beast is the job
the Stilled	burn off the Grey by exertion	active labor — surgery, riot-lines, demolition; the vigorous work clears the clock

On the seam — self-paying if the vocation fits, provided-for if it doesn't. Two Conditions don't sit cleanly in either column; their placement turns on what work the person actually does.

Condition	The Tithe	Self-pays when...	Falls to provided-for when...
Far-Voiced	vent strong emotion each day	the vocation is the vent — performer, crier, negotiator, sworn witness ; feeling in earnest on the job discharges the Tithe	the voice has no outlet — isolated posting, dull labor, silence — and they need a venting-hall furnished for them
Returned	act toward the Purpose	the Purpose aligns with the work — plague wards, recovery, tending the dead; doing the deadly job pays it	the Purpose is personal or unmet by any trade (a vengeance, a vow, a person to find) — no employer can furnish it, and it pulls against ordinary work

Provided-for Tithes — upkeep that must be supplied. For the rest, the Tithe is a cost with no productive by-product. Someone must furnish the green, the novelty, the warmth — and that furnishing is the Tithe-infrastructure sector.

Condition	The Tithe	...must be provided the Taken-In	rest on living land	green — trivial on the farm, a real expense in a stone city (potted groves, garden-leave)
Long-Lived	learn something genuinely new	novelty — books, travel, correspondence, the traffic of a university town
the Unbound	keep connecting to others	warmth — company, being known; the one Tithe money buys least well
Bound	keep the Terms	whatever the counterparty set — idiosyncratic, sometimes ruinous

The self-payers are prosperous almost automatically — their Condition is a trade — though prosperity isn't the same as ease: the Stilled self-pays and is still the most tightly licensed person in the world, and the Answered self-pays under heavy guild discipline. Self-paying buys a living, not necessarily social comfort. The provided-for are economically exposed: they depend on someone furnishing their upkeep, and whoever furnishes it holds power over them. And the seam-dwellers are the most precarious of all — a Far-Voiced who loses their stage or a Returned whose Purpose turns personal can slide from self-paying to exposed overnight.

Tithe-poverty and the safety net

Because provided-for Tithes cost money, this world has a form of poverty others don't: you can be too poor to stay whole. A Taken-In who can't afford green, a Long-Lived with no access to anything new, a Far-Voiced with nowhere to vent — these people don't just suffer want, they slide toward the scary edge: the wilting, the fade, the involuntary Cry. Destitution here has a visible, dangerous face.

So the question who pays for Tithe-provision is this world's version of the welfare question, and polities answer it differently:

- Public good. Warm polities treat Tithe-provision like roads or wells — town greenhouses, free venting-halls, endowed libraries — because a town whose Conditioned stay whole is a town that stays safe and productive. (This is also the pious framing: help everyone tend their gift.)
- Private burden. Harsher polities leave it to the individual and the guild, and the Tithe-poor fall — becoming a genuine public hazard, which the same polities then police rather than prevent.
- Leverage. The cynical middle: provide it, but hold it — an employer, guild, or crown that furnishes your Tithe can withhold it.

Labor: who does what

The Tithe and the vocation are usually the same shape — the world didn't assign these jobs, the Conditions are these jobs:

- Two-Bodied (~18%, the plurality) — the versatile backbone of physical labor: herding, haulage, rescue, courier, scouting, war. Runs in bloodlines (whole “wolf-folk” / “hawk-folk” families), so the family trade and the family Condition are one inheritance.
- the Taken-In (~12%) — the food-and-timber base: farmers, foresters, herders, wardens. The frontier economy runs on them (they thrive on living land); cities need their grain but keep them at arm's length.
- Far-Voiced (~11%) — coordination and trust-at-a-distance: the signal/relay network (criers posted on coasts, roads, borders), performers, negotiators, and sworn court witnesses. Real-time long-distance signal a medieval world shouldn't have.
- the Answered (~10%) — the elemental crafts, guilded by element: Ember (smiths, glasswrights), Tide (shipwrights, dyers), Root (masons, potters), Gale (sailmakers, millers); plus firefighting and rescue rotations.
- Returned (~9%) — the work that kills the living, done by those death can't take twice: plague wards, mine and cave-in recovery, deep and dangerous salvage, and tending the dead.
- the Stilled (~7%) — precision stillness: surgeons and medics, peacekeepers on riot-lines, controlled demolition and stonework. Licensed and guild-disciplined.
- Long-Lived (~2.5%) — the memory professions: archivists, notaries, judges, scholars, and bankers. Few by design — a world with too many deathless would ossify.
- Bound (~5%) — the enforcement and contract class: oath-keepers, debt-arbiters, treaty-swearers, witnesses whose word is literally binding.
- the Unbound (~1.5%) and Phoenix (trace) — no characteristic sector; the Unbound return to whatever they did before (needing connection to keep at it), the Phoenix is a political symbol, not a worker.

And the Kept (~25%) — here is the quiet inversion. The Kept carry no Tithe (no upkeep cost) and no Condition (no built-in trade). Economically that makes them the free generalist labor: unburdened by any Tithe-need, unclaimed by any Condition-guild, able to take any ordinary work and move where they like. Where the faithful pity the Kept for missing a gift, the ledger tells a different story — the Kept are the least encumbered people in the world. A real economic freedom hiding under a social slight.

Banking and the deathless houses

The headline financial fact of the Turning is that its banks do not die. A Long-Lived banking house is founded by a person who is still personally running it two centuries later — the same memory, the same word, the same ledger, unbroken. In a late-medieval world of letters of credit and merchant houses, this is the great Condition-labor advance in finance, and it has three consequences:

- The trusted note. A note issued by a deathless house is trusted almost as coin, because everyone knows the banker cannot forget a debt, cannot be quietly succeeded by a defaulting heir, and will personally answer for it in fifty years. Their paper circulates further and holds value better than any crown's — the nearest thing this world has to a gold standard is the word of a house that won't die.
- The long instrument. Deathless houses lend and endow on horizons no mortal lender would risk — century loans, multi-generation trusts, the patient financing of cathedrals, canals, and universities. This is longer medieval banking, not modern banking — letters of credit and endowments, not stock exchanges or joint-stock companies, which this world does not have.
- The concentration risk. Wealth that never passes to an heir never disperses through inheritance — the great scattering that mortal death forces on every other fortune simply never happens here. Even at ~2.5% of the population, the deathless can slowly gather an outsized share of standing capital — which is precisely the ossification the vampire's rarity is meant to cap, and a live tension the economy never fully resolves. An endowment moves the coin out but keeps the steering, so influence concentrates even as liquid wealth flows into the institutions they still direct.

Many houses began as road-houses in the Walking Years — inns, beds, and century-credit for families who had to walk to Thaeloren. When the walk stopped being required in the core, the same Long-Lived still remembered every debtor on the road, and the paper outlived the pilgrimage-season. They became banks. Two fates still standing: the White Note House collected; the Third Hearth kept making the bed. The trusted note is a Walking-era instrument that outlived its road.

Inheritance and the problem of not dying

Inheritance law is warped by the deathless, and in a poignant direction. A Long-Lived's children do not inherit the Condition — they age and die while the parent does not. So a deathless person outlives every heir, and their estate never enters the inheritance stream at all. What becomes of a fortune that is never passed down?

The characteristic answer closes a beautiful loop: the deathless endow. Having no heirs and needing, for their own Tithe, a steady supply of novelty — new books, new scholarship, new things to learn — a Long-Lived characteristically funds the very institutions that generate knowledge: libraries, universities, archives. The deathless banker becomes the deathless patron, and pays their own Tithe by building the places that feed it. (It is also how they grieve: an endowment in the name of a child who died a century ago.) This is not the same as letting the fortune go. An endowment is coin converted into permanent, directed patronage — the founder does not die, so they keep the chair, name the scholars, and steer the institution for centuries. So endowment eases the coin concentration (liquid wealth flows out into public works) while quietly deepening the influence concentration (the same few deathless hands still guide the universities, courts, and archives their money built). The ossification the rarity-cap fights doesn't vanish; it changes shape from hoarded gold to entrenched patronage.

For everyone else inheritance is ordinary — except the Two-Bodied bloodlines, where the Condition, the family animal, and often the family trade descend together, so a guild place and a Condition can be a single inheritance. And the law's sharpest open question is economic at root: the Given-Over — a Bound who contracted away so much of themselves that the counterparty effectively owns the person. That is the ultimate inheritance failure: an estate, and a self, absorbed by a creditor.

Center and periphery

The economy is not evenly spread. Near the mature Trees (the core), Conditions are dense, guilds are strong, and specialized Condition-labor and its goods are the great export. Out at the margins (the frontier), the giving thins — more of the population are generalist Kept or untrained Struck, fewer are Given specialists. So:

- The core exports specialized work and finished goods (Answered crafts, Stilled medicine, deathless-house credit) and imports raw staples.
- The frontier leans hardest on the Taken-In (who thrive there where cities keep them at arm's length) and on generalist Kept labor; it exports food, timber, and raw materials, and imports the specialists it can't grow. Trade friction is real — distance, spoilage, and the thin reach all mean the frontier is specialist-poor and self-reliant.

The shadow economy

Every gate breeds a black market, and this economy's gates are Tithe-provision and vouching:

- Illicit Tithe-supply. Where legitimate provision is rationed, gated, or unaffordable, a shadow market fills it: smuggled green for a Taken-In cut off from land, unlicensed venting-rooms, black-market novelty (rare texts, forbidden knowledge) for a starving Long-Lived. The desperate customer is someone sliding toward their scary edge — which makes this trade both lucrative and cruel. Lived face: the Slide.
- Off-book contracts. The Bound's whole domain has an underside: contracts sworn outside the honest tables, unregistered terms, and the predatory brokers who arrange them — the pipeline that feeds the Given-Over. No lived house. This trade is not the Slide's.

- Sold vouching. Since citizenship runs on standing-for, the unvouched will buy a voucher — and a market exists in dubious character-witnesses (the one thing that can't be faked is a Long-Lived's memory, which is exactly why their honest vouch is priceless and their corrupt one catastrophic). No lived house. This trade is not the Slide's.

How politics vary (economic faces)

The grammar is universal; the distribution is political. It runs on the same independent axes as the law. The three touchstone points have these economic faces:

The Warm (high theology). Treats Tithe-provision as a public good — town greenhouses, endowed venting-halls and libraries, ranging-commons held in common. The Conditioned are kept whole at civic expense because a whole populace is a safe and productive one (and because the faith says tend every gift). Its economic injustice is soft: the same provision comes with expectation — you are helped to tend your gift, and quietly obligated to spend it as the community sees fit. Subsidy shades into conscription.

The Watchful (governance at its extreme). The crown that writes its people down turns Tithe-need into leverage. It provides — efficiently, even generously — but holds what it provides: the green, the outlet, the novelty, all furnished through channels the crown controls and can withhold. Its deathless-house finance is superb and centuries-deep. Its injustice is cold and precise: a population whose upkeep runs through the state is a population that cannot afford to refuse it — the most complete control in the world, dressed as care.

The Frontier (low reach). Little formal Tithe-infrastructure and few specialists; people improvise their own provision or do without. Freer (no guild monopoly, no crown's leash; the Taken-In are neighbours, not curiosities) and harsher (the provided-for Tithe-poor slide with no net, untrained Struck manage dangerous Conditions alone). A barter-and-favor economy at the edges, cash-poor and land-rich.

A devout frontier runs commons-minded charity with almost no infrastructure to fund it; a secular Tree-rich republic has deep markets and thin welfare; a Watchful-and-pious core turns generous provision into the tightest leash in the world.

Daily life

Most of family in the Turning is utterly ordinary. Two people marry; some of their household carries a Condition and some doesn't; the children haven't Turned yet and won't until their tenth year. A born-Selkie wife, a husband Returned from a drowning, a Kept grandmother, three children who are simply children so far — this is not a remarkable household. It is the household. Because Conditions stack onto Kinds and arrive across a whole life, nearly every family is “mixed” in some way, and precisely because nearly every family is, mixed families are not a category anyone thinks about. There is no “interracial marriage” tension here in the Condition layer, because there is no unmixed baseline to marry away from.

Family — the whole spectrum

At the warm, mundane end (most families): a Condition is just a texture of the household, the way a trade or a temperament is. A Two-Bodied parent’s other self has a name and the children know it — “that’s Bramble, mother’s otter” — and grows up as much a part of the family as a pet that is also a person. A Far-Voiced household is a loud one, because the Tithe means feeling must be aired daily; you do not get to sulk quietly in a home with a Far-Voiced in it, and families learn to treat the evening’s singing or weeping or laughing as ordinary weather. A Taken-In parent keeps the windows open and the rooms green. These are quirks, not tragedies — the small daily accommodations of living with people who are also becomings.

In the middle, the Tithe becomes a shared family labor. Where a Condition is provided-for, keeping a family member whole is a household expense and a household duty: the green for the Taken-In, the books for the Long-Lived, the outlet for the Far-Voiced. Families organize around it the way others organize around a member’s chronic need — mostly without drama, sometimes with strain, and with the quiet knowledge that to let a loved one’s Tithe lapse is to watch them slide toward the scary edge. A family too poor to furnish a Tithe carries a particular grief: they can see exactly what their kin needs and cannot buy it.

At the aching end sits the marriage the whole setting is quietly organized around: loving someone whose becoming and yours don’t share a timespan. Chief among these is marrying a Long-Lived. Their aging simply stops; their spouse’s does not. A Long-Lived can have children and a full family, but the Condition is not reliably inherited — most children age and die like anyone — so a Long-Lived does not build a deathless dynasty; they outlive it. They watch a spouse grow old across a marriage that stays, on one side, unchanged. They bury their children. The old saying is that the cost of the Long-Lived is measured in funerals, and it is a cost paid inside the family, at the dinner table, over decades. A Long-Lived who has done this once faces the choice their whole existence turns on: stop — live on alone, keep no more households — or begin again, marry again, love again, and outlive that family too. Neither choice is cowardly and neither is free. This is the setting’s deepest, quietest ache, and it lives in the most ordinary place there is: a marriage.

A few threads:

- The threshold courtesy in the home. A Long-Lived never crosses another’s home threshold uninvited — held as the deepest good manners, the mark of someone safe to let in. Inside a family, this softens into something tender: to be welcomed across a Long-Lived's own threshold, or to welcome them across yours without a thought, is a real intimacy. A door held open is how this world says you are mine and I am yours. (A door refused is felt more than a Long-Lived will ever say.)

- The Returned come home. A person who died and Returned is, contrary to every outside expectation, not cold — a Returned is calm, deliberate, unafraid, and quietly respected, and their loved ones get them back. The chill only comes if their Purpose lapses: a Returned neglecting the unfinished thing that holds them “runs cold,” and the living can feel the wrongness at a touch. So a Returned's family learns a hard and intimate literacy — you can tell, by an embrace, whether the one you love is tending what holds them here. A warm embrace means they are well. A cold one is a family emergency dressed as a hug.
- Two-Bodied bloodlines are family lines. Because the Condition runs in blood (children of a Two-Bodied parent usually Turn the same animal), “wolf-folk,” “hawk-folk,” and “otter-folk” are real extended families, and the family animal, the Condition, and often the family trade descend as a single inheritance. Marrying into such a line is marrying into a shape your children will likely wear.
- Raising a child before they Turn. Every parent lives the same open question until their child's tenth year: what will they become, or will they be Kept? In devout homes this is held as a hopeful mystery (the Mother will give what the child can carry); in anxious ones it is a decade of quiet dread or ambition. Parents who carry a heritable Condition (Two-Bodied especially) can half-guess; most cannot. The Leaf-Fall is therefore not only a civic day but the emotional hinge of a family's life — the day you finally meet who your child has been becoming all along. In the Walking Years the question had a prior: can we even get there? A household that could walk only one child still lives in the present as a Given/Kept sibling pair.

Medicine — miraculous, and strange to outside eyes

Medicine in the Turning is genuinely astonishing for a late-medieval world, and it is astonishing for one reason: the Condition-labor advance shows up hardest at the sickbed and the deathbed. Two Conditions turn medicine into something a world of this technology should not have — and to anyone from outside, a Turning clinic is a deeply uncanny place, wonder and wrongness in the same room.

The Stilled are the surgeons. A stiller's gaze arrests motion — it holds a wound from bleeding, slows a poison's spread through the blood, keeps a patient perfectly still under the knife without holding them down. It does not petrify and does not harm; it simply stops what is moving for a beat. In a world with no anaesthetic worth the name and no way to halt a hemorrhage, this is the difference between a survivable operation and a death. The best surgeons in the world are Stilled, and a great infirmary is built around them. But sit in that operating room as an outsider and watch what it is: a surgeon whose flat, patient gaze freezes the blood in your veins on command, working fast because the Grey is filling in them as they work (their Tithe — using the Gaze fills a clock that, left full, locks their own limb to stone). They drill and spar between patients to burn it off. The most gifted healers in the world are also the most tightly licensed and quietly feared — the same gaze that saves you on the table is the one the law watches hardest. Wonder and dread, one person, one room.

The Returned do the work that kills the living. Plague wards, mine collapses, the recovery of bodies from places the living cannot safely go, and the tending of the dead — this is Returned work, done by those death cannot take a second time until their Purpose is met. A Turning mortuary is staffed by the dead, calmly and well; a plague ward that would empty a town's living physicians is walked by Returned who are unshaken by rot and contagion. To an outsider this is ghoulish. Inside, it is simply respected — the Returned are the reason a plague does not take the doctors too, and everyone knows it. There is a real tenderness in it, too: no one speaks for the dead, or tends them, as gently as someone who has been dead.

The rest of medicine is ordinary — and ordinarily unequal. Midwives, bonesetters, herbalists, the Answered's craft turned to apothecary and instrument-making — the everyday care of a 1400s town, better staffed than others because more of the population carries a useful becoming. But the Condition-medicine that makes this world exceptional is not evenly available. The great Stilled infirmaries and the deathless-endowed hospitals cluster in the rich, Tree-dense core; the frontier makes do with a travelling stiller if it is lucky and a rope-and-prayer if it is not. And the deepest inequity is Tithe-poverty already named: you can be too poor to stay whole, and the medicine that treats a lapsing Condition is exactly the medicine the poor can least reach. The miracle is real. So is the queue outside it.

Living in a Turning town — city design

A city here is shaped by a fact no other world's city faces: most of its adults have an upkeep, and some of those upkeeps are dangerous or expensive to meet. So the town builds around the Tithe the way others build around water and waste — as civic infrastructure, visible and load-bearing.

- The Tree at the centre. Every town is organized around its Turning Tree — it is the civic and sacred heart, the site of the year's most-attended day, the thing the oldest quarter grew up around. A town's age and standing can be read in its Tree (a mature grafted Tree = an old, reach-rich town; a young Tree or none = a new or frontier settlement). Geography and civic layout both point back to it. Residues layer this: a stone in the square, an upper room, a road that ends at the boughs.
- Tithe-provision as public utility. Where the polity treats provision as a public good, the town furnishes it in the open: venting-halls (common tongue: the ael-hall; Vaethorn the gift-hall; Lestrand the release-house; Threnmaieth the counted hall) for the Far-Voiced — part concert hall, part release valve, often doubling as the town's performance venue; potted groves and garden-commons (common: the greens; Vaethorn the Mother's green; Lestrand the leaf-lot; Threnmaieth the tended green) so the Taken-In don't "go to seed" indoors; endowed libraries (common: the long-house of books; Vaethorn the deathless gift; Lestrand the endowment / the house; Threnmaieth the crown archive) feeding the Long-Lived's novelty-Tithe and often built by a Long-Lived; and ranging-commons (common: the ranging; Vaethorn the wild-leave; Lestrand the beast-yard; Threnmaieth the ranging-roll) at the town edge where the Two-Bodied can be their other selves. These are as normal a part of the streetscape as a well or a market cross.

- The dangerous trades on the edges. The work that carries a bystander hazard sits where such work always sits — at the margins and the edges. Stilled infirmaries and Answered element-workshops (fire, forge, tide) are guild-quartered and set slightly apart; the Returned's mortuaries and plague-work sit at the town's edge, near the dead. Not from disgust — from the same logic that puts a tannery downwind.
- Homes that accommodate becomings. Ordinary domestic architecture quietly bends to the Conditions: windows that open and rooms kept green for a Taken-In guest, a household's evening rhythm built around a Far-Voiced's vent, a threshold a Long-Lived waits to be asked across. A Turning home is legibly a home for becomings.
- The reach-edge writes the map, again. Dense, Tree-rich core towns are thick with all this infrastructure; frontier settlements have little of it and improvise. You can read a town's place in the world off how much of its Tithe-infrastructure is public, private, or simply absent.

How politics vary (domestic faces)

The Warm (high theology). Family, medicine, and civic life all carry the gift-theology: a child's Turning is a joyous sacrament, mixed households are blessings compounded, Tithe-provision is a public good offered in the open, and the sick are tended as people whose gifts must be kept whole. Its soft injustice reaches the hearth: the Kept child is pitied for being passed over, marrying "beneath your gift" is quietly frowned on, and a family is expected to spend its members' Conditions as the community sees fit — love and pressure wearing the same warm face.

The Watchful (governance at its extreme). The register-keeping crown reaches into the family: marriages of heritable Conditions may be noticed and encouraged or discouraged, a child's Turning is an event the state records, and the medicine that furnishes a Tithe runs through channels the crown controls. Its cold injustice is domestic surveillance — a household whose upkeep and bloodline are both on file is a household that cannot easily refuse the crown anything.

The Frontier (low reach). Thin infrastructure, thin medicine, thin ceremony. Families improvise their own Tithe-provision or do without; a travelling stiller is a rare blessing; the Taken-In whom core cities keep at arm's length are neighbours and kin here, the backbone of the place. Freer (no one polices your marriage or your gift) and harsher (a lapsing Condition with no infirmary to reach, an untrained Struck child with no guild to catch them). Warmer in feeling, poorer in safety-net.

A devout frontier holds joyous Turnings with almost no infirmary behind them; a secular Tree-rich republic has superb medicine and a marriage market that shrugs at theology; a Watchful-and-pious core turns the sacrament of a child's Turning into a state census with a hymn over it.

Tithe-infrastructure

The lived official sector — who furnishes green / novelty / outlets, and who stamps the handful of hazardous-Condition tickets. Not clergy. Not the Slide.

Everyday: the furnishing, or just the greens and the halls. There is no liturgical umbrella — this is civic work, not a fifth faith. Vaethorn says the gift-works. Lestrاند says the provision the way it says the wells. Threnmaieth files the counted channel.

In one sentence: they keep people whole enough, in public, and they stop at the gate.

Shape of the sector

- Two jobs that are not one house. Furnishing keeps a provided-for Tithe from becoming a public hazard (green, an outlet, a new page). Ticketing marks competence for the three Conditions that can hurt a bystander (the Stilled, Far-Voiced, the Answered). A town may house both under one lintel. They are still two jobs. The Bound's "ticket" is a table, not a body-guild.
- Official means enough, not a week. A commons-share, a scheduled hour, a library that is open. The product is a person who can walk away until tomorrow. The Slide's product is a person who cannot. The town is glad of both and will not say so about the second.
- They think they are in a public-works story. Wells. Yards. A playhouse. A surgeon's college. They do not call themselves monster-wardens.
- No Furnishing Seat. A town keeps its own lot and hall. A deathless house endows its own long-house. The licence-guilds charter their members. Nothing in this sector micromanages a far commons.

Who furnishes what

Tithe	The official door	Lived house	What they will not do
Taken-In green	garden-commons / the greens / a leaf-lot	the Greens-Keepers	Will not follow you home. Will not rent you a private pot after the share fails. That is the Slide.
Far-Voiced outlet	the ael-hall (playhouse and safety-valve)	the Hall-Keepers	Will not give you an unscheduled Cry. Will not keep you half-vented so you come back tonight.
Long-Lived novelty	the long-house of books	no new order — the deathless house that endowed it, still sitting the chair	Will not ration a page to own you. A junior who does that has started a week.
Unbound warmth	almost none	family; an attic of the Table-Keepers; the Slide's paid sitting	The sector cannot buy being known. There is no warmth-guild.
Bound Terms	the honest table	the Book-Hands (civic year) + the Counterparty (the clause)	Not a body-licence. There is no fourth hazard-guild.
Returned Purpose	cannot be furnished	a Book-hand may find a payable year; no one can supply a vengeance	There is no Purpose-desk.
Two-Bodied ranging	the ranging / a beast-yard	civic land, no guild	Self-paying. No ticket. There are no wolf-police.

The three tickets (danger-to-others only, held by the person, issued by the craft):

Ticket	Condition	Lived house	Why a ticket at all strictest	the Stilled	the Stillers	the Gaze can hold a person forever
heavy, training-first	Far-Voiced	the Hall-Keepers (the same building as the outlet)	a Cry in a crowded hall
heavy, training-first	the Answered	the Element-Guilds	an untended element in a workshop
not a body-ticket	Bound	a table, not a guild-yard	walking legal instrument; the Whisper cannot command

The Intake is the shared underdog office of the three ticket-houses: the raw Struck, already live, no childhood apprenticeship. Not a travelling clergy. Not a week.

The long-house (novelty without a new order)

A Long-Lived house that has endowed a library is already Tithe-infrastructure. The founder is still alive. They still name the scholars. They still sit the chair. Coin went out; steering stayed.

Staff are clerks — often the Kept, unencumbered, able to fetch a book the founder has not read. A junior Long-Lived copies. There is no liturgical name and no college of librarians.

What they furnish is something genuinely new. What they will not furnish is a page at a time to a person who cannot walk in. That junior — the one who will extend a subscription one more week — is how the Slide sits next to a long-house without being one.

The gate (the sector's shared courtesy)

Every official door stops at a line the town has agreed to call enough:

- The greens-keeper keeps the lot. They do not walk the wilting room.
- The hall-keeper keeps the hour. They do not open after the lamps for a voice that missed its slate.
- The long-house is open. It is not a courier of rumours to a fade in a closed chamber.
- The ticket-house trains the Given child and stamps the competent adult. The raw Struck is the Intake's problem, and the guild is glad to forget them if the catching-year is quiet.

The Slide begins where that line is. The guilds pretend not to know. That pretending is already part of the town.

This is not kindness-as-cruelty in the Slide's shape (the measured week). This is jurisdiction. We keep the commons. We do not keep you.

How they live in the three corners

- Vaethorn (the gift-works). Tithe-provision as a public good with almost no guild to fund it. A commons that is a cousin's field. A blessing-to-practice said over a stiller who learned on a riot-line because there was no infirmary. Soft injustice: you were helped, so you will spend the gift as the valley sees fit. The Slide here is the last pot when the commons run out.
- Lestrand (the provision). Posted. A leaf-lot by the season. A release-house that is also the playhouse. Guild-tickets as master's papers. You can be priced out of staying whole. The Slide is week-rent after the season-fee failed.
- Threnmaieth (the counted channel). The crown furnishes — efficiently, even generously — and holds what it furnishes. A counted hall. A tended green. A crown-warrant. The darkest leash in the world, dressed as care. The Slide is the late week the channel will not admit failed.

Kumbaen. Almost no Given Tithes. There is no exported greenhouse or ael-hall. A wreck walked uphill is a guest.

This sector is not a fifth faith. Not a census. A bed-list is plants. A hall-slate is hours. A guild-roll is practitioners of a dangerous art. The one kingdom that writes persons and gifts is still only Threnmaieth. Not the Road-hands. They carry wood. These houses carry dirt, an hour, a ticket.

The Greens-Keepers

The lived face of official green — garden-commons, the greens, a leaf-lot. They furnish enough living land that a Taken-In can rest and walk away. They are not the Slide.

Everyday: greens-keepers, or lot-keepers. Liturgical: the Saelhael — SAYL-hayl — sael “sowing; the first green” + hael “whole”: those who keep you hale by putting you back on growing ground.

Vaethorn's second word is Mother's-green hands; Lestrand's is lot-keepers (ordinary, like saying gardener); Threnmaieth files them as the Tended.

In one sentence: they keep the lot — and they will not follow you home.

Shape of the house

- A commons, not a church. There is no Green Seat. A town has a lot, a strip along the wall, pots in a yard the size of a tannery. Vaethorn's “lot” is often a cousin's field held in common. The house is whoever waters it and says who sleeps on which bed tonight.

- Enough, then the gate. A share is a night on living dirt, a season on a bed, a commons-hour. The person should leave able to work. A person who cannot leave is not this house's product. That person is how you find the Slide.
- They think they are in a gardening story. Soil, blight, whose beans took. They do not call themselves wardens of a people.
- A bed-slate is plants. Rows, which bed is tired, which needs a year of beans. Names get onto it because a person is on a bed. The keepers will tell you it is horticulture. In Threnmaith the crown already has another list.

If you meet one

Dirt under the nails. A key to a gate in a wall. A slate. You would miss them as clergy if you came looking for a lintel. You would find them if you asked where a Taken-In sleeps when the rooms are stone.

They are useful the way a well is useful. A stone town cannot keep its Taken-In without a lot. The faith, if any, is extra.

Who comes, and when

Who	Why they come	What the greens-keeper does	What they will not do
A Taken-In who works in town	The rooms are stone; the Tithe is due	Give a share: a bed, a night, a commons-hour. Write the bed, not the person, if they write at all.	Will not follow them home with a pot. Will not open the gate after the share-hour because the wilt has started.
A family, before the town sees	A parent is going to seed indoors	Open the lot if there is a bed. Send them home with the hour named.	Will not make the wilt a sermon. Will not tell the warden unless the person asks.
A Struck Taken-In, raw	They came through a green door later, alone	Find them dirt now . Point them at a door-keeper if the door still needs walking.	Will not name them Given. Will not licence a grove.
A Book-hand with a settling	The term assumes a greens-share	Honour the term if there is a bed. Mark the slate full if there is not — the book becomes owing , not this lot's lie.	Will not invent a bed to close someone else's book.
A crown-clerk (Threnmaith)	The tended green must match the channel	Give the beds the roll already expects	Will not pretend a wilt off the lot is not happening. They also will not walk to it.
Almost no one who is not Taken-In	—	Water. Turn tired beds. Argue beans.	Will not become a food-guild. Grain is a different door.

An ordinary week

They open the gate. That is the whole kindness. A Taken-In lies down on living ground. The tokens fill. They leave. The bed is turned. The next name — no, the next row — is watered.

They bury last year's commons-leaf under a new bed. No one will explain this to a guest. A first-year who asks is told that is how the lot remembers.

When the queue is longer than the wilt, they still open the gate for the share they have. They close it when the share is gone. They do not walk the three streets to the room where someone is going to seed. They know a cousin still has a pot. They do not say the cousin's name.

A child of the house learns the work by carrying water and by being told not to take the key home.

They will not follow you home. They will not rent a private pot after the share fails. They will not steal a scion to make a grove. They will not call the share a gift on Lestrand, or a debt anywhere they can help it. They call it a share. They will not run a Kumbaan export.

Who may keep a lot

Not by Kind. A human, a Kitsune, a Tengu who will water and keep the gate can be of the house.

By practice first. You are of the house when the lot is still alive in the dry month, and the town still sends its Taken-In to you.

Condition leans, not Condition-gates. Watering and blight often fall to a Taken-In who kept a commons, or a Kept with no Tithe of their own who can sit the gate year-round. The slate to whoever can read a tired row — sometimes a Long-Lived who remembers which bed failed twenty years ago. The gate at close to a Kept, or anyone who will lock it.

How they live in the three corners

- Vaethorn (Mother's-green hands). The commons is a cousin's field. They will say they are tending a gift. The quiet obligation is the harvest: you were laid on the Mother's green, you will spend the green as the valley asks. When the field fails, the last pot is the Slide, and they will still call it tending.
- Lestrand (lot-keepers). Posted. A leaf-lot by the season. Coin on the gate. A Taken-In who cannot pay the season is not this lot's problem until they wilt in the street — and then they are the watch's. The Slide is the lot that still opens.
- Threnmaieth (the Tended). The crown furnishes the tended green and can withhold it. Beds match the channel. A wilt off the lot is a leak the roll does not want to file. The keepers look like gardeners. The leash is the water.
- Kumbaan. No.

The gate

Whoever furnishes a provided-for Tithe holds power over its bearer. The greens-keepers hold that power and refuse to carry it past the wall.

That refusal is their kindness (they will not own you) and their cruelty (they will not walk three streets). The town is glad. A person who wilts quietly off the lot is not a public hazard. The Warm can say the gift was offered. The quay can say the season was posted. The crown can say the channel held.

Confirming the Leaf-Mother is real and kind does not open a free parlour-grove. She gave the need for living land. She did not build the gate.

Tired beds are real. A lot can be botanically full and still have a queue. That is not a lie they tell. It is also a choice about who sleeps on stone.

A bed-slate

Lestrand leaf-lot, nailed inside the gate. The verso is last season's slate, the tired rows still marked.

Beds 1–12: taken through the next moon. 13–16: beans, do not lie here. 17 is tired; it will take next year. Share is one night or one hour at open sky, then the gate. If you cannot come, send no one — a bed is not a letter. We do not walk the rooms. If you have already wilted, the lot is still the lot. Come when we open. If you cannot wait, we do not know a pot.

On its face: competent gardening, a little cold, a commons keeping itself honest. Underneath: the gate confessing itself, and a blindness the keeper cannot afford — that “we do not know a pot” is the only lie on the slate. The child who carries water can name the cousin. The slate cannot.

The Hall-Keepers

The lived face of official outlets and the Far-Voiced ticket — one lintel, because the seam Condition is the building. The ael-hall is a concert house until it is a release-valve. They furnish enough voice that a person can walk until tomorrow. They are not the Slide.

Everyday: hall-keepers, or ael-hands. Liturgical: the Aeloren — ayl-OR-en — ael “to air; to let feeling out” + oren “to witness”: those who hear you vent and will say you did. Vaethorn's second word is gift-hall folk; Lestrand's is release-hands (ordinary, like saying box-office); Threnmaieth files them as counted-hall clerks.

In one sentence: they sell you an hour in which you may feel in earnest — and they will not open after the lamps.

Shape of the house

- One building, two jobs. The hall furnishes the outlet (Tithe-infra) and stamps the Voice-ticket (safety-guild). The same mouth that says your hour is the third says you may stand in a crowded room.
- The hour is enough. A scheduled vent — song, weeping, a relay-call, a laugh that empties the chest. The person should leave emptied and able to work. The Slide's shut room is one outlet that is never quite enough. This house wants you gone until tomorrow.
- They think they are in a playhouse story. Bills, benches, who carries the high note. They do not call themselves a police of feeling.
- No high hall with authority. The oldest playhouse on a Lestrand quay is old. The next town's hall does not write to it for leave.

If you meet one

Ink on a finger, or chalk. A slate of hours. A hall that smells like sweat and lamp-oil and last night's joy. You would buy a bench and not know which hour was "church." You would find them if you asked where a voice can be loud without becoming a Cry in the market.

They are useful the way a well is useful, and the way a master's ticket is useful. A town with Far-Voiced and no hall has a Book-hand writing owing and a watch waiting for the market.

Who comes, and when

Who	Why they come	What the hall-keeper does	What they will not do
A Given Far-Voiced child, after the colour	The voice must be trained before it is a hazard	Apprentice them: breath, projection, venting on purpose. The ticket comes when the town can stand next to them.	Will not Speak the colour. The warden did that. Will not call the voice a gift on Lestrand.
A working Far-Voiced (performer, crier, witness)	The vocation is the vent — self-paying	Give them the stage, the relay-post, the stand. Stamp the year if the ticket is due.	Will not invent a crisis so they can vent off-slate.
A Far-Voiced who lost the honest stage	Isolated posting, dull labor; the Undertow is close	Sell or grant a scheduled hour . Empty them. Send them out.	Will not open after the lamps. Will not keep them half-full so they return tonight.
A Struck Far-Voiced, raw (the drowning-door)	The voice came back untrained	Hand them to the Intake. Sit the first hour with Intake if the Cry is already in the room.	Will not stamp a ticket on a raw throat. Will not leave them in the market.
A Book-hand with a settling	The term assumes a seventh-day hour	Honour it if the slate has a hole. Mark full if it does not.	Will not pretend Greyhull has a bench when Greyhull is full.
Anyone who came for a play	The hall is also the playhouse	Sell a bench. Take the coin. Let the working voices pay their Tithe as the show.	Will not stop a performance to process a ticket. The show is the Tithe for the people on the boards.

An ordinary week

Morning — the slate. Hours named. Relay-posts listed. A child's breath-lesson in the cold hall. The ticket-desk is a stool by the door.

Evening — the house. Feeling in earnest, on purpose, where a neighbour paid to hear it. This is the pleasant version of the Tithe, and it is also the town's entertainment. No one calls that a coincidence.

The unswept bench. One seat is never swept. That's the first Cry's seat. No one will explain which Cry. A first-year who sits there is moved without a sermon.

When a voice misses its hour, the keeper does not open the side door. They know a room that still shuts. They do not say the room's name.

They will not stamp a raw Struck. That is the Intake. They will not rewrite a Bound's Terms because a voice was used to swear them. They will not run a mission-hall on Kumbaan.

Who may keep a hall

Not by Kind. A Selkie crier and a human neighbour hold the same stool if they can keep a slate and hear when a voice is about to break.

By practice first. You are of the house when the town still comes to your hour, and when you have pulled a child off a Cry before it landed.

The boards, the relay, the stand often go to Far-Voiced whose vocation is the vent. The ticket-stool to a Given Far-Voiced who trained young, or a sharp Kept, or a Long-Lived who remembers last century's Cry. The first hour with a raw throat to whoever will sit it — Intake borrows this room.

How they live in the three corners

- Vaethorn (gift-hall folk). A barn, a festival, a blessing said over the first note. Almost no ticket-stool. A Struck throat is a late gift and a hazard the valley will stand around, singing, until someone who has been to a real hall arrives. Soft injustice: you were given the hour, you will spend the voice as the valley asks — crier, witness, hymn.
- Lestrand (release-hands). The playhouse is the hall. Posted hours. Guild-ticket as master's papers. A voice without coin for a bench still has a labour-hour at the back if they will sweep. A voice without even that goes to week-rent.
- Threnmaieth (counted-hall clerks). The crown furnishes the counted hall and can withhold the hour. Tickets are crown-warrants in all but the stamp. A Cry off-slate is a column. The hall looks like a festival. The leash is the hour.
- Kumbaan. No. A bright night is not an ael-hall.

The scheduled hour

The hall sells (or grants) the right to feel in public on time. Off-time is a ticket problem. A performer who lost the honest stage still has the hour — if the slate has a hole, if the season-fee was paid, if the crown still lists them.

The town is glad. An emptied voice is not a Cry in the market. The Warm can say the gift was aired. The quay can say the bill was posted. The crown can say the channel held.

Confirming she is real does not make the eighth week kind. She gave a voice that must vent. She did not build the slate.

Self-paying voices subsidize provided-for ones when the polity lets them — the show is some people's Tithe and other people's night out. Lestrاند calls this the market. Vaethorn calls this tending. Both can be true in one barn.

The first Cry's bench stays unswept. That is not a theology. It is how the hall remembers.

An hour-slate

Lestrاند release-house, chalked on the door beside tonight's bill. The verso is yesterday's slate, not washed.

Third hour: the boards (paid). Fifth: relay-drill, apprentices. Sixth: open hour, two benches, no coin if you sweep. After the lamps: the house is shut. A missed hour is a missed hour. We do not keep a throat half-full. If you have already cried in the street, this is still the house — come at open, not now. If you cannot wait, we do not know a room.

On its face: a playhouse being practical, almost kind (the sweep-hour). Underneath: the slate confessing the gate, and the same lie the greens tell — “we do not know a room.” The first Cry's bench is not on the slate. Everyone knows which one it is.

The Stillers

The model safety-guild. They licence the Stilled. They run the infirmaries. They are not a census and not monster-police. Guild-issued tickets; the state watches the guild, not the person.

Everyday: stillers, or the Stillers' Guild. Liturgical: the Stelhael — stel-HAYL — stel “to still; to hold from moving” + hael “whole”: those who keep you hale by holding you still. Vaethorn's second word is blessing-surgeons; Lestrاند's is ticket-surgeons; Threnmaieth files them as crown-stillers.

In one sentence: they will save you on the table, and they will make you drill until the Grey is gone — the ticket is competence, and the clock in the surgeon is the hospital's clock.

Shape of the house

- The model the others imitate. If you understand this guild, you understand a Voice-ticket and an element-ticket. A roster of practitioners of a dangerous art. Not a list of a people.
- Two rooms, one clock. The infirmary (wonder) and the yard (spar, patrol, the riot-line). Using the Gaze fills the Grey. The yard empties it. The guild's best work creates the guild's Tithe. That is not a paradox they have solved. It is the job.
- They think they are in a surgeon's-college story. Apprentices, a code, a ticket like a master's papers. They do not call themselves keepers of monsters.
- No Stillers' pope. A rich core infirmary is rich. A frontier stiller is one tired person. The charter is local. The state watches the charter.

If you meet one

Calm. Flat-eyed when they are working. Hair that stirs when something nearby has gone too still. You meet them in an infirmary, on a drill-floor, or on a line that has not yet become a massacre. You would not know which hour was "guild" unless you already needed a ticket.

They are useful the way a surgeon is useful. A town without one makes do with a rope-and-prayer.

Who comes, and when

Who	Why they come	What the stiller does	What they will not do
A Given Stilled child, after pale stone	The Gaze must be trained before it is a forever	Apprentice them. Drill. Theatre. The ticket when they can still a wound and not a person.	Will not Speak the colour. Will not put them on a riot-line in the first year.
A patient	Bleeding, poison, a knife that needs a still field	Hold the moment. Work fast. Walk to the yard after and burn the Grey.	Will not hold a will. Cannot. Will not still a person as punishment.
The watch, or a street that is turning	A brawl about to become a pile of bodies	Stand the line. Still the swing, not the person, if they can help it.	Will not become the town's executioner. A forever-hold is a crime the code names.
A Struck Stilled, raw (they were stone)	The Grey is already in them, unpracticed	Hand them to the Intake. Sit the first drill with Intake. Reverse what can still be reversed.	Will not stamp a ticket on a raw Gaze. Will not leave them in the square.
A charter-clerk	Someone unlicensed stills in public	Protect the charter: take them in, or swear they were not of the house	Will not write the town's people down. A guild-roll is not a Threnhael.
Anyone who wants the Gaze as a weapon	—	Refuse. The code is the ticket.	Will not sell a forever. Anyone who does is not of this house.

An ordinary week

Theatre. The pleasant horror outsiders remember: a gaze that stops blood, a surgeon who must then go and move. Between patients they drill. They spar. They dance, badly, because dance works the Grey out. No one calls this therapy in the core; they call it the job.

The doorknob. They touch a doorknob before they look at a patient. If the knob has gone still under an unwatched Gaze, the room is already wrong. A first-year who forgets is sent back to the yard.

The yard. Exertion on purpose. The Tithe paid as professional identity.

The ticket-stool. A master's mark. Held by the person. The guild knows its members the way any craft does. In Lestrand the ticket can start to behave like property — a place, a chair, a name on a door. That is the house's live argument, not a world-law.

When a raw Struck arrives, the paying floor loses a master for a week. The guild is not grateful. That week is the Intake.

They will not still a will. They cannot. They will not pretend they can to frighten a street. They will not let the Grey run to a public seize if they can still drag the person to the yard. A seize on the floor is a ruined charter. They will not become Threnmaieth's register. A roll of stillers is not a roll of the Stilled. They will not export a college across the storm-wall.

Who may hold a ticket

Not by Kind. The Gaze does not care what you were born.

By practice first. You are of the house when you can still a wound and then move, and when the town has watched you do both.

Theatre and the line go to the Stilled — the Tithe and the vocation are the same shape. The yard to anyone who will make them move — a Kept drill-master; a Two-Bodied who will run them. Intake week to the master who can be spared (often the one the floor can least spare), or a Struck who remembers stone and will sit the first drill.

Skeptics are welcome. The Gaze does not require a Mother. Believers in Vaethorn will still say a blessing-to-practice. Both can hold the same ticket.

How they live in the three corners

- Vaethorn (blessing-surgeons). One tired stiller, a blessing-to-practice, a riot-line that is also the only theatre. Almost no college. Soft injustice: you were trained, you will stand every line the valley has. The rope is still how a raw Struck is met if the stiller is three valleys away.
- Lestrand (ticket-surgeons). Superb infirmaries. Guild-ticket as property-adjacent. You can be priced out of the chair. The charter is a commercial good. Unlicensed practice threatens the charter as much as the street.
- Threnmaieth (crown-stillers). The crown wants the ticket as a crown-warrant and the roll as a column. Some masters cooperate (stewardship). Some refuse: a guild-roll is not a Threnhael. The Gaze that saves you runs through a channel that can be withheld from a household the crown dislikes. The darkest infirmery in the world, still a real infirmery.
- Kumbaan. A travelling stiller is a guest, not a chapter.

The Grey as labor

The guild's best work fills the clock that will lock a limb if they do not then labor. So the house needs them on the table and in the yard. The charter needs them never to lapse in public. The infirmary's pace is set by the surgeon's Grey, not only by the patient.

That is not a scion-queue. That is not a week. That is a hospital that runs on its staff's Tithe.

The ticket-as-property argument (Lestrang, leaking elsewhere) is the second face: competence lives in a person; the chair can start to live in the guild.

Confirming she is real does not make the drill optional. She gave a gaze that costs. She did not write the roster.

Intake is badly paid. The raw Struck who most need a week in the shed are the week the floor can least spare. That is why Intake is the underdog, not a prestige rotation.

A Grey-drill roster

Core infirmary, chalked on the yard wall. The verso is yesterday's, washed badly.

After third theatre: spar, full glass. After the line: the long run, no Gaze. Apprentices: the knob first, always. A Grey that stays overnight is a Grey we file as lapse, not as rest. The shed is not on this wall. If you were stone last week, you are not on this wall. Come to the door that does not face the street. We do not write that door. We do not still a person to close a day. Touch the knob. Then look.

On its face: a college keeping its people hale, the code in a work-order. Underneath: the paying floor confessing that Intake is a door they will not write, and a blindness the master cannot afford — that “a Grey we file as lapse” is how a tired surgeon becomes a charter problem instead of a person who needs a longer run. The knob is not explained. It does not need to be.

The Element-Guilds

The third safety-ticket and the self-paying craft — the Answered channelled by element. One sector, four doors. Not four cloned orders.

Everyday: the element-guilds, or the Ember-house, Tide-house, Root-house, Gale-house. Umbrella: the Crae — kray — crae “craft; the working of an element.” A single Answered is of the Crae; they are of Ember if you need the door. Vaethorn's second word is gift-shops; Lestrاند's is the craft-houses; Threnmaith files the Reckoned Craes.

In one sentence: the shop is the Tithe — leaving it is not a career change; it is a hazard with your name on it.

Shape of the house

- Four doors, one grammar. Ember (smiths, glass, firefighting). Tide (hulls, dyers, anything that wants water to behave). Root (masons, potters, the carrying-earth a Road-hand may buy). Gale (sails, mills, instruments, the wind a Tengu already knew). They share a ticket-logic and an Intake shed. They do not share a pope. An Ember-master does not set Tide's fees.
- Self-paying until you leave. Earnest work slakes the Tithe. The guild is therefore the upkeep. That is why the monopoly has metaphysical teeth: a benched Answered is not merely unemployed.
- They think they are in a craft-mystery story. Apprenticeships, shop-rules, which coal may go dark. They do not call themselves elemental police.
- Wildcard standing stays. An even-tempered Root potter and a short-fused Ember smith share a name and almost nothing else.

If you meet one

Sweat, clay, salt, or chalk-dust, depending on the door. A shop-rule nailed up. A ticket-stool that looks like any master's. You would hire them to build a hull. You would find the ticket if you asked who may let an element speak in a crowded yard.

They are useful the way a craft guild is useful. A late-medieval town already needed smiths and masons. The Condition made the guilds necessary twice — once for the work, once so the work does not let go.

Who comes, and when

Who	Why they come	What the house does	What they will not do
A Given Answered child, after lamp-amber	The shade named the element; the shop must catch them young	Apprentice to that door. Earnest work. The ticket when the element answers the hands and not the room.	Will not Speak the colour. Will not switch a child's element because the town needed Tide.
A working Answered	The craft is the Tithe	Give them the shop, the watch-rotation, the fire-crew, the escort.	Will not bench them “for a rest” without a plan. Idle is the hazard.
An Answered who lost the shop	Grief, a wrecked yard, a lord who benched them	Find earnest use now — a crew, a demolition, a night at the bellows.	Will not rent them a week of “just enough spark.” That is a Slide-shaped lie.
A Struck Answered, raw	A threshold let an element in later, untrained	The Intake. The right door, not the nearest fire.	Will not stamp a ticket on a raw Reach. Will not put them on a hull the same day.
Anyone who wants a thing made	A hull, a glass, a wall, a sail	Make it. Charge as a craft charges.	Will not let an unlicensed cousin “just coax the stone” in the street. The charter is the street's safety and the shop's monopoly.
A Road-hand needing carrying-earth	Root can coax living earth to travel	Sell the earth. Do not walk the scion.	Will not become Thaelvaeth. Different cart.

Four doors (faces, not chapters)

Door	The work	The shop-rule you notice	If left idle
Ember	smith, glass, fire-crew	they never let the last coal go dark	heat finds a place to be
Tide	hull, dye, anything wet	a cup of yesterday's water on the lintel	water finds a place to be
Root	mason, potter, carrying-earth	clay under the nails they will not wash on a work-day	stone and soil find a place to be
Gale	sail, mill, instrument	a window that is never fully shut	wind finds a place to be

The “place to be” is self-contained, never a seized will. The guild’s job is to make sure that place is the shop, not the crowded hall.

An ordinary week

The shop. The rotation (fire-crew, escort, the watch that is also Tithe). The ticket-stool. The shop-rule no one explains to a guest.

When a master is pulled to Intake, the paying floor loses a Reach for a week. Ember hates this during a dry month. Tide hates this when a hull is mid-bend. That hatred is why Intake is the underdog.

They will not switch an element to suit a labour shortage. The shade named it. They will not bench “for their own good” without earnest use waiting. That is how a room lets go. They will not stamp a raw Struck. They will not become a fourth clergy. They will not export a Crae-college to Kumbaan.

Who may hold a ticket

Not by Kind. Ember is not a Drakona chapter. Gale is not a Tengu chapter. A Tengu Gale-Answered is a common lean, not a gate.

By practice first. You are of the house when the element answers your work and not the rafters.

The shop goes to the Answered of that element. Fire-crew and rescue rotations to Ember and Gale, also Two-Bodied on the line and Returned in the wreck. Carrying-earth to Root, also Taken-In who will not call it a grove-rite. Kept labor is the free generalist around the Reach — strikers, pullers, the person who holds the mundane tool. Lestrاند’s free. Vaethorn’s Waited, still useful.

How they live in the three corners

- Vaethorn (gift-shops). One mixed yard, four tools, a blessing-to-practice. Soft injustice: you were answered, you will spend the element as the valley asks — the mill, the wall, the fire-line. Idle is rare because the valley will not let a gift sit.
- Lestrand (the craft-houses). Deep shops, posted tickets, monopoly-teeth. You can be priced out of the chair and still need the work, which is how a person slides from self-paying to exposed overnight. The charter is money and safety in one paper.
- Threnmaith (the Reckoned Craes). The crown wants element and person on the same column. Workshops are channels. A benched Answered is a withheld Reach. The shop looks like a gift-works. The leash is the fire, the slip, the stone, the wind.
- Kumbaan. A wrecked Tide-Answered is a guest. There is no Tide-house on the sand.

The shop you cannot leave

Self-paying is an economist's miracle until you want to stop. The Tithe does not care that you buried a child, that the yard burned, that you are tired of glass. Idle, the element speaks for itself.

So the guild's kindness (a shop, a crew, a rotation) is also the leash. Leaving is a Tithe-crisis. The Warm calls that vocation. The quay calls that a contract. The crown calls that a channel.

Confirming she is real does not make a rest-year safe. She answered. She did not build the shop-rule.

The last coal, the cup of yesterday, the unwashed clay, the window that will not shut — those are how each door remembers.

A shop-rule

Ember-house, Lestrand glass-yard, nailed above the last coal. The verso is a Tide-house rule from the next quay, used as backing.

The last coal stays. A Reach used in play is not a Reach used in earnest — the ticket will not have it, and the room will. If you cannot work, you will still work: the fire-crew, the night bellows, the watch. We do not bench. We do not rent a spark. The shed is not this door; raw hands go to the door that does not face the street. If you have already let go, this is still the house — come to the coal, not to the square. Gale will not take you. Tide will not take you. The coal will.

On its face: a craft keeping its people steady, a little fierce, a monopoly wearing safety. Underneath: exit refused as care, and a blindness the master cannot afford — that “we do not bench” is also you may not leave. The Tide-rule on the verso says the same thing about a cup of water. The two houses did not copy each other. They did not have to.

The Intake

The shared underdog office of the Stillers, the Hall-Keepers, and the Element-Guilds — mandatory guild-intake for dangerous Struck. Not clergy. Not a travelling circuit. Not the Slide.

Everyday: the Intake, or the raw-desk, or the shed. Guild-cant: the catching-year. There is no liturgical name. An office that the paying floor will not write on the wall does not get a holy one. Vaethorn says the late-catching; Lestrاند says the emergency ticket; Threnmaieth files the unwitnessed warrant.

In one sentence: they have a week to make a live hazard into a person the town will stand next to — and if they succeed, no one writes it down.

Shape of the office

- A door, not a road. The Struck is brought here, or a runner arrives and a master is pulled off the paying floor. They are not a circuit. When they travel it is because the nearest ticket-house is three days and the rope is already in someone's hand — an accident of distance, not a route. The Road-hands already have the route.
- Three ticket-houses, one shed-logic. A raw Gaze, a raw throat, a raw Reach. Right house. Wrong house is how a Cry gets stilled quiet or an Ember is put on a bench to sing. The office is shared; the door is not.
- They think they are in a first-aid story. Catch. Steady. Hand to the year. They do not think they are in a redemption-play.
- Success is silence. The guild leadership is indifferent-to-hostile. A quiet catching-year is a week the floor lost. A loud one is a charter hearing. No one converts. A grudging extra pair of hands is the most the yard will grant, and they will take them back.

The underdog shape

- Mandate. Take a raw Struck (Stilled / Far-Voiced / Answered) in hand and begin the apprenticeship at once, before the town meets them with a rope. The enemy is time, an already-live hazard, and a town that wants them gone.
- Constraints. The shed that does not face the street — not the theatre, not the boards, not the paying shop. One master pulled off the floor, whoever will sit, maybe a Kept who has no Tithe of their own. They can take the person if the person will come. They cannot overrule a frontier rope. They cannot stamp a ticket this week. The charter is at risk if the person harms someone or if they refuse the Struck and the town later says the guild left a hazard. Leadership forgot them on a good day and will scapegoat them on a bad one. Support is conditional on silence.

- Who ends up on it. Not a Kind-unit. Not the floor's favourites. The master who can be spared (often the one who cannot). A Kept who will sit because they are free and the floor resents that. A Struck who remembers their own door. A junior ticket on probation. Formation is assigned or inherited — last year's leftovers — more often than recruited.
- Victory. The person is still alive, still here, and beginning to be safe to stand next to. The town pretends this was always going to happen. The guild does not apologize.

If you meet one

Tired. Chalk on a sleeve. A key to a door the slate does not name. You would miss them if you came in the front of the infirmary or the playhouse. You would find them if you asked where the one who was stone yesterday went, or if you were the runner.

They are useful the way a midwife is useful, except the birth is a later becoming and the town may prefer it not happen.

Who comes, and when

Who	Why they come	What Intake does	What they will not do
A raw Stilled (they were stone)	Grey already filling; a rope in the square	Get them off the square. First drill. Reverse what can still be reversed. Sit the Gaze until it is a wound-hold, not a forever.	Will not stamp a ticket. Will not still the crowd as a lesson.
A raw Far-Voiced (they drowned)	Undertow already pulling; a Cry in the market	Get them into the hall's back room. First hour with a hall-keeper if one will sit. Vent on purpose before it vents them.	Will not open after the lamps as policy. Will not keep them half-full.
A raw Answered	An element let go later, untrained	Right door. Earnest use now that is not the crowded shop.	Will not put them on a hull the same day. Will not bench them.
A family, or a door-keeper, or a Book-hand	Someone must stand; someone wrote owing	Take the person. Ask who will stand for them as what they are now .	Will not sell a vouch. Will not call them Given.
The watch	The square wants them gone	Bargain for the shed instead of the rope. Sometimes lose.	Will not fight the town as a knightly order. They have a key, not a charter to command a street.
The paying floor	They want their master back	Finish the week or fail it. Return the master.	Will not promise this will not happen again.

An ordinary catching-year (it is not ordinary)

There is no ordinary week. There is a week.

1. Get them off the square, out of the water, away from the shop that is already wrong.
2. Name what is already true: you carry a Gaze; you carry a voice; you carry a Reach. Do not name a Mother unless the person does.
3. Find the first honest payment of the Tithe that is not a public hazard — a drill, an hour, a coal that is not the public forge.
4. Find someone who will stand for them anew. Intake is not a hiding-place from the vouching seam.
5. At week's end: still raw, beginning to be safe, handed to the real apprenticeship — or gone. Gone means the rope, the road, or a week-keeper who will not make them safe.

They write the catching-year on the inside of a ticket-blank, not on the face. The face stays empty until a real ticket is earned. A first-year who writes on the face is made to strike it.

They will not stamp a ticket this week. Competence is not a week old. They will not become a circuit. If they must walk, it is toward this Struck, not along a route. They will not rewrite Bound Terms. A raw Bound is a table's problem, not a shed's. The Whisper cannot command; they are not this office. They will not take a raw Taken-In, Returned, Two-Bodied, Long-Lived. No bystander ticket. Those doors have other houses.

Who may sit the shed

Not by Kind. By practice first — you sat a week and the person did not become a public story.

The first drill / hour / coal to a ticket-holder of that hazard. The sitting, the water, the food to a Kept (no Tithe of their own; can stay). "I remember the door" to a Struck who came through Intake once. The runner to whoever can run — Two-Bodied; a Far-Voiced crier who will not use the Cry to clear a street.

How they live with the other houses

The parent houses pretend the shed is not on the wall. Success is silence. A raw Taken-In is not this shed — dirt is the lot. If the week fails, a week-keeper may take the overflow. Intake wants them safe enough to leave. The Slide wants them not-fallen enough to stay. A quiet receiving-rite may happen the same week as a warden's. Civic settling may send them here. A door-keeper names the Struck kin at the door that made them; kinship is not a ticket. Two courtesies in one week. A Watcher's second mouth may describe the threshold; description is not a stamp.

How they live in the three corners

- Vaethorn (the late-catching). The rope is real. The shed may be a barn. Soft injustice: once caught, the valley will spend them. The late-come are vouched graciously and put to work.
- Lestrand (the emergency ticket). Posted, almost. A fee if anyone can pay it. The charter-risk is commercial. A raw Struck who cannot stamp a fee is still taken — the street-hazard demands it — and the house will remember the debt.
- Threnmaieth (the unwitnessed warrant). The crown wants the Struck named as they are caught. Intake's inside-writing is already a defiance. A quiet week looks like a leak. A loud week looks like incompetence. The darkest pressure: catch them for the channel.
- Kumbaan. A wreck walked uphill is a guest. There is no shed on the sand.

The week no one writes

The paying floor needs the master. The town needs the hazard gone. The Struck needs a year. Intake is given a week and a shed, and is blamed for all three.

If they succeed, the story becomes: the guild trains its own. If they fail, the story becomes: the shed. Confirming she is real does not make the rope kind, and does not give them a better door. She did not unwitness the becoming. People built the square that prefers a rope.

Badly paid. The parent house's leftover stipend. In kind: the shed, the food, the master's lost week. They do not furnish a commons. They do not sell an hour. They catch.

A catching-year slip

Written on the inside of a blank ticket, stillers' shed, core town. The face is empty.

Inside only. Gaze, raw. Came from stone on the third night. Stood for by the sister and by N. who will not give a family name. First drill held. No forever. No ticket. If the week ends quiet, burn this. If it does not, the charter already knows. We do not face the street. We do not write the wall. If they have already been a rope-story, this is still the shed — come if they will come. If they will not, we cannot make a town take them. The Mother does not reach twice by chance. Neither do we. That line is the wardens'. Strike it if you must. I have not.

On its face: a competent catching, a little desperate, a college's shame in a folded paper. Underneath: the office stealing the Seat's sentence because it is the only heavy line the writer knows, and a blindness they cannot afford — that “burn this” is how success becomes the guild's ordinary story and the Struck's becoming stays unwitnessed twice. The empty face is the point. The sister stood. N. would not be named. Both are the vouching seam in one slip.

Three corners: Vaethorn, Lestrاند, Threnmaieth

Every polity in the Turning sets three knobs, independently: theology, reach, governance. The three grammars — law, economy, daily life — are portable: they hold across the great powers because they flow from the Trees and the Conditions, which are universal. A polity's character is the combination of the three axes it sets separately.

Three corners, chosen so that each pair shares exactly one axis and differs on the other two.

Name	Theology	Reach	Governance	The one-line feel
Vaethorn (the Waiting Lands)	high	low	low	Ardent faith, thin Trees, almost no state — a warm, poor, half-lawless pilgrim edge
Lestrand (the Ledger Coast)	low	high	low	Faith worn lightly, dense Trees, guilds not crowns — a rich, cool, transactional merchant power
Threnmaieth (the Tallied Crown)	high	high	high	Sacred and surveilled — a wealthy, pious core where the census is a holy duty (the darkest corner)

- Vaethorn and Lestrand share low governance — same light-touch state, opposite everything else: warm-poor-faithful vs. rich-cool-secular.
- Vaethorn and Threnmaieth share high theology — same ardent faith, wildly different circumstances: devotion at the starving edge vs. devotion in the sanctified, watched core.
- Lestrand and Threnmaieth share high reach — same Tree-wealth spent two opposite ways: free markets vs. a sanctified panopticon.

Theology is not a moral axis. High-theology produces both the kindest corner to a whole neighbour (Vaethorn) and the most inescapable control in the world (Threnmaieth). Devotion is a multiplier on whatever else the polity is, not a virtue or a vice by itself.

The name a polity gives a shared institution reveals its stance. A devout land’s “gift-hall” is a surveillance-crown’s “counted hall.” Same building, three worldviews.

Vaethorn — the Waiting Lands

(vay-THORN · theology high · reach low · governance low)

A broad, thinly-peopled land at the world’s Tree-poor margin, where the faith burns hottest precisely because the Trees are scarce — and where the ruling mood is waiting: for a graft to take, for a distant Tree to be reached, for a gift that may never fall. This is the Frontier with the theology knob turned all the way up — and the combination is not a contradiction, it’s a feedback loop: where the Trees are few and young, more children come away Kept, more people are Struck later and alone, and the Motherfaith answers that scarcity not with less devotion but with more — pilgrimage, longing, and a theology built around waiting for a gift that may not come.

Law here. Governance is almost absent — no crown reaches the individual, and custom outruns written law the way it does on any frontier. Citizenship is witnessed in the oldest, most literal way: a settlement small enough that everyone was there when you Turned. But the Lands' thin reach makes citizenship-by-witness fragile: with few Long-Lived to remember and few Bound to vouch, the three pillars that make proof-by-people work are stretched thin, and the unvouched Struck — a person who changed alone, with no guild to catch them and few witnesses to stand for them — is a constant, aching problem Vaethorn meets with faith rather than machinery. A feared Condition here is more likely to be met with a rope or a blessing than a licence, because there is no guild to issue one. Standing-for is the speaking, vouched at worship. The ticket is the blessing-to-practice. The will is the Mother's own line.

Economy here. Little formal Tithe-infrastructure and few specialists — but the theology reframes the frontier's poverty as charity. Where a purely secular frontier improvises Tithe-provision as barter and favor, Vaethorn does it as alms and congregation: the venting a Far-Voiced needs happens at worship (the gift-hall), the green a Taken-In needs is furnished by neighbours who count it a sacred duty (the Mother's green), and the Taken-In whom rich cities keep at arm's length are here the honoured backbone of the land — working the living earth is the holy economy. It is commons-minded generosity with almost nothing to fund it: real warmth, real want, and a persistent thin edge where the provided-for Tithe-poor slide with only prayer for a net. The ranging is the wild-leave. The long-house of books is the deathless gift. The Slide here is the last pot / gift-credit.

Daily life here. Thin ceremony made enormous by devotion. A child's Turning at a small, hard-won grafted Tree is the event of a decade, held as a joyous, anxious sacrament — and the Kept child is felt most sharply here, because in a land starved of the gift, to be passed over reads (wrongly, and cruelly) as being passed over by the Mother herself. The Kept are the Waited / Mother-kept. The Struck are the late-come. Medicine is a travelling stiller if the settlement is lucky and a rope-and-prayer if it is not; the core-vs-edge inequity is at its widest here. Families are warm, mixed, and self-reliant; a lapsing Condition with no infirmary to reach is a frontier tragedy the faith consoles but cannot cure. The warden is most of the state: Hands-folk. The door-folk keep the older state the land still keeps. Guest-reading towns pilgrimage and walk. First-reading districts tend a dying guest and refuse the blessing.

Its injustice (the soft-frontier blend). Not a boot — a guilt. The scarcity of the gift becomes a theology of unworthiness: the Kept wonder what they lacked, the Struck wonder why the Mother came to them at the wrong door and alone, and a hard, quiet piety can shade into treating want as a spiritual failing. Vaethorn is the kindest place in the world to a whole neighbour and the loneliest to an unvouched one.

Lestrand — the Ledger Coast

(leh-STRAND · theology low · reach high · governance low)

A dense, Tree-rich merchant power where the Trees are mature and many, the Given are dense, and the faith is worn lightly. Deep markets, thin welfare, and a cool, transactional read on the whole business of becoming. It shares Vaethorn's light-touch governance — no crown writes anyone down — but where Vaethorn's light state leaves a gap the faith fills, Lestrand's light state leaves a space the guilds fill, completely.

Law here. The world's warm default at its most developed: guild self-rule carried as far as it goes. The state is a charter-granting council of merchant houses and craft-guilds; it charters the Stilled's guild and the element-guilds and watches the guild, never the individual. Citizenship-by-witness runs smoothly here precisely because reach is high — abundant Long-Lived notaries, Bound whose sworn word closes every contract, Far-Voiced on every dock and in every court. The three pillars aren't reverence here; they're infrastructure, the machinery that lets a huge commercial city run on trust without a register. The Struck are vouched-in briskly and without much fuss — not graciously, just efficiently, because an unvouched person is a transaction that can't clear. They are the turned. The Inviolable Will is cited less as sacred bedrock than as sound commercial law: a Bound's contract binds property, not persons, and the Coast likes that line because it makes the Bound the perfect notary. Standing-for is warranting. The ticket is the guild-ticket. The will is the free-will clause. The Motherfaith is the old rite, worn light. The Fair Hand is the Settling, ordinary.

Economy here. The richest corner, and the coolest. This is where deathless banking reaches full flower — deathless houses whose trusted notes are the nearest thing the world has to a gold standard, century instruments, the whole endow-not-inherit loop running at scale (the great endowed libraries and universities cluster here, funding the Long-Lived's own novelty-Tithe). Self-paying Conditions prosper — the Answered crafts, the Two-Bodied haulage and courier trades, the Stilled surgeons — because their labor is their upkeep and the market pays for the labor. Tithe-provision is a private market, not a public good: you buy your green (the leaf-lot), your novelty (the endowment / the house), your outlet (the release-house, also the playhouse), and if you can afford it you stay whole in comfort. Its injustice is the market's — the provided-for Tithe-poor get thin welfare in a rich city, the starkest have-and-have-not gap in the world, and the shadow economy (smuggled green, black-market novelty, sold vouching, off-book Bound contracts feeding the Given-Over) runs biggest here because the legitimate market is biggest here. The concentration risk the deathless pose is at its most acute: a handful of houses that never die, quietly steering the wealthiest polity through patronage that never disperses. The Slide is week-rent. The Kept are the free. The ranging is the beast-yard. Tree-wardens are tree-tenders. Book-hands are the Settling-hands.

Daily life here. Superb Condition-medicine (the great Stilled infirmaries and deathless-endowed hospitals are here, in the rich core) — for those who can reach it; the queue outside it is longest here too. Family life shrugs at theology: a marriage market that reads Conditions as assets — a Two-Bodied bloodline is a trade dynasty, a Long-Lived match is a century of credit, and the aching Long-Lived marriage gets weighed coolly as a balance of grief against advantage. The Turning is a civic and commercial milestone more than a sacrament — a family's Leaf-Fall is watched for what guild the child's colour opens. Warm it is not; free and prosperous it very much is. An attic-host of the Open Table is a curiosity and a good supper; "no one is a stranger twice" is printed, by sailors, as a proverb on a card. The Settling will not enforce it.

Its injustice (the market blend). The coolest of the three. Nothing is policed — your marriage, your gift, your faith are your own — but everything is priced, and a person who cannot pay slides with a whole rich city stepping around them. Lestrang will never file you or conscript you. It will simply let you fade if you run out of coin, and feel that it owed you nothing.

The seat. Orentel (or-EN-tel) — a salt-quay city on the inner sea. The White Note House sits on the third quay, north side, and is not the crown.

Threnmaith — the Tallied Crown

(THREN-my-eth · theology high · reach high · governance high — the darkest corner)

A pious, Tree-rich core kingdom that is also Watchful. Take the Watchful touchstone — the one aberrant crown that breaks the world's norm and keeps a census of persons and their Conditions — and set it in the wealthiest, most devout, most Tree-dense land, and you get surveillance not as a nervous king's paranoia but as sanctified duty: the roster is kept because the Mother's gifts are precious and must be accounted for. This is what makes it the darkest of the three — the other two have injustices you can name and resent; this one dresses its injustice in the two things the world most trusts, faith and plenty.

Law here. The aberration in full sacred flower. Alone among polities, the Tallied Crown keeps a record held on people — every subject and their gift written down, not as guild rolls or tax ledgers (everyone has those) but as a census of persons, framed at home as reverent stewardship of the Mother's blessings and experienced as exactly what it is: surveillance. The census is the Threnhael. Because reach is high, there is a great deal to count — dense Given (the marked), dense guilds, abundant Long-Lived whose memory the crown distrusts precisely because it isn't the crown's (Threnmaith's deepest tell: it will not rely on the three pillars the rest of the world runs on, because living memory answers to itself and a ledger answers to the crown). The unvouched are hunted and the Struck pursued to be catalogued (the unwitnessed); the Bound are watched far past their real hazard — pure stigma dressed as safety, since the Inviolable Will means the Whisper can't command and the roster's own clerks know it. Devotion supplies the justification the bare Watchful crown lacks:

you would not hide a gift from the Mother, so why hide it from her stewards? Standing-for is the naming. The ticket is the crown-warrant. The will is the crown's assurance. The Motherfaith is the Reckoned Faith. Watchers are the Grown-Over, a column on the roll. Book-hands are the Uncounted Book. Door-keepers are the Unreached. The Open Table is off the map.

Economy here. Tithe-need turned to leverage — and consecrated. The crown provides Tithe-upkeep efficiently, even generously (a pious, rich state can afford to), but holds what it provides: the green (the tended green), the novelty (the crown archive), the outlets (the counted hall), the Stilled medicine, all furnished through channels the crown controls and can withhold. A population whose staying-whole runs through the state is a population that cannot afford to refuse it — the most complete control in the world, and here it wears a halo: to receive your Tithe-provision is to receive the Mother's bounty through her appointed hands, and to be cut off is framed as your lapse, not the crown's lever. Its deathless-house finance is superb and centuries-deep — but the Long-Lived here are courtiers and crown-archivists as much as bankers, their incorruptible memory bent to the census rather than free to check it. The ranging is the ranging-roll. The furnishing is the counted channel. The Slide is the late week — the leak the roll cannot file without admitting the channel failed. The roll pretends not to know.

Daily life here. The sacrament and the census fused. A child's Turning is a joyous holy day that is also a state registration — the colour that falls is celebrated with a hymn and recorded by a clerk. Marriages of heritable Conditions (Two-Bodied bloodlines especially) are noticed, encouraged or discouraged, filed. The medicine that furnishes a Tithe is excellent and runs through the crown's channels. A household whose bloodline and upkeep are both on file is a household that cannot easily refuse the crown anything — domestic surveillance with a blessing said over it. The Kept are pitied here in the Warm's way and recorded in the Watchful's — the unmarked / the passed-over, passed over by the Mother, and noted as such. Tree-wardens are the Reckoned Hands. The First Seat stands in the same Sacred Core. The crown wants wardens named to the Threnhael as officers of the Reckoned Faith. Some Speakers cooperate. Some refuse: the Tree witnessed; a ledger is a second, lesser seeing. Proximity is pressure, not ownership. The college can refuse the roll — and some Speakers don't. A Yumboe in the Sacred Core is a diplomatic incident of manners, not a column. The crown cannot file a people who were never at a Tree. That is a relief and a slight at once.

Its injustice (the sanctified-surveillance blend). The worst of both the high knobs, each excusing the other. The devotion sanctifies the surveillance (it is reverence to be counted), and the surveillance enforces the devotion (to refuse the count is impiety). There is no clean villain and no cackling tyrant — only a wealthy, faithful, orderly people who genuinely believe that accounting for the Mother's gifts is the highest form of tending them, and a machinery of control that this belief makes almost impossible to resist. It reads as chilling precisely because no other polity keeps such a list — the creepy record is this one crown's invention, and the faith is what lets it feel like grace.

The seat. Maiethlir (my-eth-LEER) — a thaw-river Hand in the Sacred Core. The extra mile is the leftover; the Threnhael is the layer. Does not own Thaeloren. The First Seat sits in the Motherwood beside.

The Lands

The map of the Turning is not a scatter of lands. It is a gradient of the Trees' reach, and reading it outward tells the whole story of the world:

sacred-dense origin → mercantile middle → thin frontier → storm-walled isle beyond

There is one Awakening Tree — Thaeloren — and every town Tree is a living graft carried outward from it. The further a land sits from the deep, old, densely-grafted core, the thinner its reach tends to run: fewer, younger, more fragile Trees; more children left among the Kept; more people Struck alone and later. The physical map and the cosmological map are the same map. In the world this reads as plain distance and history.

How a land sounds, how it Turns, and where it sits are one fact seen three ways. The Old Tongue drifts furthest from the sacred sound exactly where the Trees are thinnest: the conservative drift in the core, worn on the frontier, eroded on the trade coast.

How the continents sit

Reading the world roughly east to west, along the reach-gradient:

- Maiethorn anchors the east — the old heart, where the land is oldest and most settled and the Awakening Tree still stands. Everything the world calls “the center” is here.
- Strandoren lies west across a navigable inner sea — close enough to Maiethorn for constant, ancient trade (the two are the “Old World” pair), its long indented coasts facing the crossing. The inner sea between them is the busiest water in the world.
- Heskoren sprawls further west and south, beyond Strandoren’s far coast — reached late, grafted late, the edge of the settled world. Between Strandoren and Heskoren the sea widens and the reach thins; this is where “the frontier” begins.
- The Sundering Isle sits alone in the far west (or deep south) ocean, past Heskoren’s last capes — walled off by a band of killing weather, currents, and reef that has wrecked most who tried the crossing. It is off the edge of the reach-gradient entirely: near-Treeless, seldom reached, its people mythic-rare in all three other continents.

These are working orientations to keep the map coherent. The load-bearing facts are the relative positions and distances — Maiethorn and Strandoren close and old; Heskoren far and thin; the Isle sundered beyond. Those drive the reach-gradient, trade, and story.

The four continents at a glance

Continent	Reach	Role	Named powers here	Rival faith
Maiethorn (the Motherland)	full	The sacred origin; the Awakening Tree stands here	Threnmaieth · Maiethvael · Orenbren · Saelthael · Eolstrand · Lirorn	the Watching
Strandoren (the Shorelands)	high	The great trade continent, the world’s crossroads	Lestrand · Brenledd · Leddvael · Trenledd · Netstrand	the Fair Hand
Heskoren (the Sundered Reach)	thin	The frontier; newest-grafted, half-wild	Vaethorn · Ornled · Vaelhesk · Saelvaeth	the Old Ways
The Sundering Isle (Kumbaan, the Yumboe homeland)	near-none	The storm-walled remote isle; mythic-rare people	(not a mainland power)	the Open Table

The three archetype polities land on three different continents. Each of the three large continents also carries several of the fifteen great powers; the archetype is only the most-worked example on each.

The Motherfaith is one faith among several. Rather than quarantine other religions on the far isle, they are woven into the large continents, where they rub against the Motherfaith and generate friction.

Maiethorn — the Motherland

(mah-YETH-orn · maieth “Mother” + orn “land” = “the Mother’s Land.” The conservative drift, spoken almost unchanged from the liturgy.)

Maiethorn is the world’s old heart — the continent people mean when they say “the center.” It is old the way a cathedral town is old: long-settled, deeply grafted, every hill with its Tree and every Tree with its centuries. This is where the Motherfaith began, where the Awakening Tree grows, and where a child’s Turning is least remarkable precisely because it is most certain — the Trees here are so healthy that nearly every child is Given, and being Kept is rare enough to be an event. The whole Condition-economy runs at full depth here: deathless houses centuries old, Stilled infirmaries, Far-Voiced on every court and quay. If the rest of the world is the reach-gradient thinning outward, Maiethorn is the thick, bright source it thins from.

Proximity to the holy is not peace; it is pressure. Devotion here is heaviest, most institutional, and most political: the faith is not simple and pure but old, layered, and contested, with a sanctified surveillance-crown (Threnmaieth) and a stubborn heartland heresy both claiming the sacred center.

Geography and climate

The Sacred Core. At Maiethorn's heart stands Thaeloren, the Awakening Tree — the First Hand, in a deep old grove that is the destination of the world's great pilgrimage. The land around it is the most densely-grafted on earth: an old, gentle country of rounded hills, river valleys, and Tree-crowned towns, worn smooth by long settlement.

The Motherwood. Vast old-growth forest of motherwood and its wild kin rings the core — the healthiest Trees, the graft-nurseries from which scions travel to the whole world. The First Seat and the faith's institutions cluster in the wood's clearings.

A central range divides the continent's watersheds. Temperate, seasonal climate — four true seasons, real winters that make the solstice-timed Leaf-Fall meaningful. Old roads and river-trade knit it together. Tengu hearths and Fox-of-the-Snows country sit on the high snows; the range is also why the east is dry.

The Rain-Shadow. East of the central range, on the leeward side away from the inner sea, the land falls into dry hills and sand-country — the one true dry reach in the known world. This is the hearth of the Fox of the Sands. It is still Maiethorn (same Trees, same conservative tongue, same pilgrimage-pull westward toward Thaeloren); it is simply the Motherland's other weather. Towns here cluster at wells and at whatever graft will take in thin soil. Playable square: Ornsael (the sown-ground; west-road after the core stopped).

The western coast faces the busy inner sea toward Strandoren — the oldest trade route in the world, the "Old World" crossing. Ports here are ancient and rich, if less frantic than Strandoren's. Selkie families are common on these quays, as they are on any old water.

Reach

Full — the densest, healthiest grafting anywhere. Nearly every child Given; the three pillars (Long-Lived memory, Bound word, Far-Voiced feeling) thick on the ground; the Kept genuinely uncommon and, in the more fervent districts, quietly pitied as passed-over. This is the world's Condition-density ceiling.

How the wood got here is the First Cut: Cut-years 0–80, origin-towns first, a day’s living-earth at a time. The Rain-Shadow was slower — same continent, thin soil, wells. Core squares stopped walking while sand-country still went west. That is dirt, not a different gospel.

Powers

- Threnmaieth — the Tallied Crown (theology high · reach high · governance high). The wealthy, pious, surveilled core kingdom, coiled near the sacred center. Its census — the Threnhael — sanctifies surveillance as reverent stewardship of the Mother’s gifts. Maiethorn’s full reach is why Threnmaieth has so much to count. Seat: Maiethlir (thaw-river Hand; does not own the grove).
- Maiethvael — the Gift-Realm: devout, rich, no list.
- Orenbren — the Witness-Hearths: lodging as power; does not own the Tree. Square: the Third Hearth.
- Saelthael — the Sown Tree: Rain-Shadow still walking. Square: Ornsael.
- Eolstrand — the Hinge-Shore: inner-sea face.
- Lirorn — the Thaw-Land: range and snowmelt.

Hearths, not Kind-nations. The twelve stubs’ seats stay unnamed.

Faith

The Motherfaith’s birthplace and stronghold — its institutions, its pilgrimage, its authoritative tree-wardens all seat here. But the sacred center is contested, not serene.

The heartland heresy — the Watching. An older Tree-faith the Motherfaith grew over persists in Maiethorn’s oldest districts — the friction is at the center, not the frontier. They keep the Tree as witness (Haelthael) and refuse the Mother-name. Because it is old, it claims to remember what the world believed before the Trees were understood as the Mother’s hands.

In the Walking Years, people had to come: the Near Mile was how Maiethorn Turned. The pilgrimage to Thaeloren remains a road-story engine — everyone comes here eventually.

Strandoren — the Shore-lands

(worn to Strandor in daily speech · strand “shore” + oren = “the Witnessed Shore,” eroded smooth. The name itself shows the drift: a sacred root worn down by the docks.)

Strandoren is the crossroads of the known world — a continent of harbours, its long coastline so deeply indented with bays, sounds, and peninsulas that no point sits far from saltwater. If Maiethorn is the old cathedral heart, Strandoren is the market that grew up facing it: all charter-towns, guild halls, banking houses, and quays. The Trees here are mature and many — reach is high, the Given are dense — but the faith is worn light, folded into commerce until a child's Turning is watched less as a sacrament than as a question of which guild the colour opens. This is where deathless banking reaches full flower and Condition-labor buys the world's most advanced public works.

It is genuinely free and prosperous and cool: nothing here is policed (your faith, your gift, your marriage are your own), but everything is priced, and the injustice is the market's — a person who cannot pay simply fades while a rich continent steps politely around them. Warmth is not its virtue; liberty is.

Geography and climate

The indented coast. Strandoren's defining feature — a shoreline of countless natural harbours, tidal estuaries, and sheltered sounds. Every notable town is a port; the sea is the continent's highway. This is the densest Selkie hearth in the world — not a Selkie nation, a lot of shoreline.

The inner sea (east) — the narrow, crowded, ancient water between Strandoren and Maiethorn: the busiest crossing in the world, the “Old World” trade artery.

The open ocean (west and south) — where the coast faces the widening sea toward Heskoren and, far beyond, the Sundering Isle. Strandoren's boldest merchant-houses run the frontier trade to Heskoren; almost none have crossed the storm-wall to the Isle (those who claim to are the tellers of the Yumboe stories).

Interior: fertile lowlands and river-plains feeding the port-cities; mild maritime climate, wet and temperate. Mature grafted Trees stand thick along the wealthy coasts and thin only in the deep interior.

Reach

High. Grafts mature and abundant, especially coastal; the Given are dense and the three pillars are pure infrastructure here — not reverence but the machinery a huge commercial society runs on (Long-Lived notaries, Bound whose word closes contracts, Far-Voiced on every dock and in every court). The Struck are vouched-in briskly and efficiently — an unvouched person is a transaction that can't clear.

How the wood got here is the First Cut: Cut-years 40–160, by sea, wealthy coasts first. A ship is faster than filling every inland hamlet, and a coast could pay a Cutting-leave while a Near-Mile village was still on the list. Interior river-days came later. The Fair Hand files this as the carrying — a bill of lading, not a wound in wood.

Powers

- Lestrand — the Ledger Coast (theology low · reach high · governance low). The premier merchant power: guild self-rule carried as far as it goes, deathless-house finance at scale, Tithe-provision as a private market (buy your green, your novelty, your outlet — and fade if you can't). The richest and coolest corner of the world. Seat: Orentel (Salt Quay; the White Note House placed, not crowned).
- Brenledd — the Hearth-League: many charters, one compact.
- Leddvael — the Reckoned Gift: Fair Hand as civic rite; Book-hands still have no seat.
- Trenledd — the Worn Count: a roll with the hymn worn off.
- Netstrand — the Night Shore: west water, Heskoren trade.

Faith

Faith worn light — but not absent, and here it has a rival with real doctrine.

The fortune-and-contract cult — the Fair Hand (Leddoren). A mercantile theology that reads Conditions not as gifts given (the Motherfaith's line) but as bargains struck — the world is a ledger of deals, and what you became is what you (or your line) bargained for. Direct doctrinal rival to gift-doctrine, at home among the Bound. It reframes the Tithe as a term serviced rather than an upkeep tended.

The Salt Walk was the berth that made Eolthael; miss the last crossing and you missed the year.

Heskoren — the Sundered Reach

(worn to Heskoren in daily speech · coined root hesk- “far/outer edge” + orn “land” = “the Outer Land.” A frontier coinage; the root doesn't appear in the old liturgy because the liturgy is older than the frontier's grafting.)

Heskoren is the edge of the world that the Trees reached last. Where Maiethorn is old and full and Strandoren is rich and connected, Heskoren is young, thin, and waiting — a broad, rugged, half-settled land where the grafts came recently, take poorly, and sicken often, so that whole districts wait on a Tree that hasn't taken and a gift that may never fall. This is the continent that runs heavy on the Kept (children who reached no healthy Tree at ten) and the Struck (people who changed later, alone, unwitnessed) — and it is the continent where the Motherfaith burns hottest, because scarcity of the gift answers not with less devotion but with more: pilgrimage, longing, and a whole theology of waiting.

In the Walking Years that pattern was the rule of distance (the Long Mile); some districts are still on it. Distance did this, not unworthiness.

It is warm, poor, and self-reliant — the kindest place in the world to a whole neighbour and the loneliest to an unvouched one, where the danger isn't raiders but a lapsing Condition with no infirmity to reach and a faith that consoles what it cannot cure. Its cruelty is quiet and theological: scarcity of the gift shading into a doctrine of unworthiness.

Geography and climate

Rugged and various. Highland spines, upland moors, deep forests, and long river-runs down to a wild coast. Bigger weather, harder winters, more untamed ground than the Old World pair. Tengu ridge-towns and Fox-of-the-Snows hearths sit on the spines; Fox-of-the-Wilds and the deeper woods share the same forests; Selkie families hold the wild coast.

The grafted pockets. Settlement clusters wherever a graft has taken — a healthy Tree is the seed of a town, and the map of Heskoren's civilization is really a map of its surviving Trees. Between them: unpolity'd wild, thinly-held marches, and long roads between Tree and Tree.

The frontier coast faces the open ocean back toward Strandoren (the lifeline of trade and new grafts) and, far beyond the last capes, the storm-band that hides the Sundering Isle. Heskoren's westernmost capes are the closest settled land to the Isle — and the source of many who've seen the storm-wall even if they never crossed it.

Climate: cooler, wetter, wilder than Maiethorn and Strandoren; a land where the solstice-timed Leaf-Fall is a hard-won event of a decade, not a yearly certainty.

Reach

Thin. Grafts young, scattered, and prone to sickening; the three pillars stretched thin (few Long-Lived to remember, few Bound to vouch), so citizenship-by-witness is fragile and the unvouched Struck are a constant, aching problem met with faith rather than machinery. High Kept, high Struck, low specialist infrastructure. In-world this reads as plain distance-and-history — Heskoren is the Grafting this decade, not a closed age.

How the wood got here is the First Cut: Cut-years 200–387, still incomplete. The gap after Strandoren's coasts is dead wood on the Long Mile, a chain of Hands that had to grow up, and a queue that preferred a paying next — not unworthiness. Vaethorn will preach otherwise. History does not agree. Old Ways host-rights start at the planting: the first meal, or a claiming. Lived front, present tense: Harrow's Green as the neighbour's canopy; the Three Hamlets Past the Ford still walking this year (Brenod · Vaelun · Ornath).

Powers

- Vaethorn — the Waiting Lands (theology high · reach low · governance low). Ardent faith, thin Trees, almost no state — a warm, poor, half-lawless pilgrim edge whose ruling mood is waiting for a graft to take, for a gift that may not come. Its injustice is a guilt (scarcity read as unworthiness), not a boot. Seat: Eolvaeth (pilgrim-edge vale; not Saelvaeth's march).
- Ornled — the Outer Ledger: secular frontier.
- Vaelhesk — the Far Yield: Old Ways host-rights.
- Saelvaeth — the Sown Waiting: live front as a march; Harrow's Green in its orbit, not as a capital.

Fewer, poorer, scattered; un-polity'd wild still fills the space between.

Faith

Two faiths in tension, and the friction is the frontier's own:

- The Motherfaith burns hottest here — a theology of longing and pilgrimage grown around the scarce gift.
- The Old Ways (Vaeloren). An animist / ancestor faith that predates the grafts: “the Mother's reach is new here — we had our own ways before her Trees came.” It reveres the Struck and the Taken-In as the land's own children, and resents the Motherfaith as a latecomer. Real theological standing, real grievance.

The Sundering Isle — Kumbaan

(Common tongue — the sailors' name: “The Sundering Isle” or “the Sunder,” for the sundering water that walls it off and the ships it has sundered. In the Yumboes' own tongue: Kumbaan — koom-BAHN — “the hidden home.” The two names are the whole relationship in miniature: outsiders name the barrier, the Yumboes name the hearth.)

The Sundering Isle is off the edge of the reach-gradient entirely — the one land the grafts never reached, or never held. Where Heskoren is thin, the Isle is empty of the Trees the rest of the world is built around, and its people become what they are by their own path, outside the Leaf-Fall altogether. It is walled off by a permanent band of storm, current, and reef — the storm-wall — that has wrecked most who tried the crossing, so that in Maiethorn, Strandoren, and Heskoren alike a Yumboe is a figure from a sailor's tale: pearly-skinned, silver-haired, “the good people from across the drowning sea.” Some of the stories are even true.

Kumbaan is an ordinary home, warm and hospitable and deeply itself, that happens to be nearly impossible to reach. The uncanniness is entirely in the distance: the Yumboes are not strange to themselves, only to a world that has never met them. Familiar surface (a hospitable hill-people who love a feast), uncanny underneath (served by hands you cannot see; a whole people the world thinks is a legend).

Kumbaan is not a thirteenth mainland power and not a sixteenth: it is an isolate with a table, a moon, and a storm-wall. The Isle is a people at home; it is not a flag on the Seat's list.

Geography and climate

The storm-wall. A near-permanent girdle of violent weather, treacherous currents, and reef rings the Isle — the reason it stays sundered. Ships that try the crossing are wrecked, turned back, or simply never return. There may be a season, or a way, the wall thins — a live campaign question, not a settled fact.

The Paps — the hill country. The Isle's defining landform: rolling green hills honeycombed beneath with the Yumboes' true dwellings. They live within the hills, coming out by moonlight; the surface is pasture, terrace, and standing-stone, the life is below.

Mild, wet, moonlit. A temperate maritime island climate under the storm-wall's cloud — but the Isle is famous (in its own tellings) for its bright nights: the people are nocturnal, and moonlight is their daylight.

Small. The one small continent of the four — an island-continent, not a sprawl; walkable, known-in-full by its people, the opposite of Heskoren's trackless vastness.

Reach

Near-none. Few or no healthy Trees — the grafts never crossed the storm-wall. The First Cut is explicit: never. Sailors tell of pots that went into the water. Dead wood is not a Tree. The Yumboes do not Turn at a Tree; whatever they become, they become otherwise.

People — the Yumboes

The Isle is the homeland of the Yumboes (“Bakhna Rakhna,” the good people) — pearly-white-skinned, silver-haired, hill-dwelling, moonlit, and famously hospitable to strangers, native and foreigner alike.

- They live beneath the hills, come out by moonlight, and hold great feasts served by hands and feet you can see but bodies you cannot — the Isle's signature uncanny image.

- They are native to Kumbaan and rare beyond it — the storm-wall keeps them home, so the few who do cross become the source of every legend the mainland tells.
- Their tongue and faith are their own — non-Maiethren, owing nothing to the Leaf-Mother.

Faith

The Open Table (Ndeyaan) — the Yumboes’ own cosmology, grown in isolation and owing nothing to the Motherfaith. Their old accounts frame the good people as bound up with the ancestors and the dead (the Yumboes are called “the spirits of the dead”), reinvented here as a living faith of hill, moon, hospitality, and the staying-kin — not literal ghosts. The Table-Keepers keep the hall; the Shore-Sitters keep the sand.

The Reckoning of the Year

How the Turning keeps time. The Leaf-Fall is solstice-timed, so the year’s reckoning is load-bearing: it fixes when children Turn, when the great festival falls, and how a world with mechanical clocks but no printing press actually counts its days. Astronomy is kept light — enough to run the rite and date events, not a full orrery.

The sky

A single sun and a single moon on a familiar monthly cycle — enough to give the world nights, tides, and the Yumboes’ moonlit calendar. Four true seasons, real winters (the temperate Old World register). The one fact that matters cosmologically is the solstice — the sun’s turning-point — because that is when the Trees turn.

The Leaf-Fall happens at the solstice because that is when the Trees turn their colour and choose — the sun reaches its turning, and so do the children. Believers read this as the Mother timing her choosing to the year’s own hinge; skeptics read it as ordinary seasonal biology (the Trees respond to light, like any tree). Both are content with the same calendar.

The Turning Year

The year hinges on two solstices — the world’s fixed astronomical anchors:

- The Deep Solstice (midwinter) — the longest night; the year’s low, turning point. A season of hearth, endowment-giving, and the deathless houses’ account-closing.

- The High Solstice (midsummer) — the longest day, and the Turning. This is the great one: the solstice when the Trees turn and the year’s ten-year-olds meet the Leaf-Fall.

The High Solstice is warm, safe to travel and gather, and full of light — a child’s Turning is a joyous festival, and midsummer suits it. It also makes the pilgrimage to Thaeloren a summer road.

Turning-Week

The Leaf-Fall is not a single day but Turning-Week — the week bracketing the High Solstice, when the Trees hold their colour and the choosing is done. Every child who has turned ten since the last High Solstice Turns this week; the town gathers, the tree-wardens officiate, and it is at once the holiest rite and the biggest fair of the year (part christening, part graduation, part festival). A person’s Turning-year becomes a lifelong marker of age and cohort: “we Turned the same summer.”

Months and weeks

A plainly-countable calendar:

- Twelve months tied to the moon’s cycle, in four seasons of three months each, hinged on the two solstices (and the two equinoxes between them as lesser markers).
- Weeks as the working unit of the burgher world — guild-weeks, market-days, the mechanical clock-towers of the trade cities striking the hours. No printing press means calendars are clergy- and clerk-kept, not mass-printed — one more reason the tree-wardens and the Tallied Crown’s clerks hold quiet power: they keep the dates.

The twelve Maiethren months

Liturgical names are Maiethren; the common-tongue / Lestrاند worn form sits beside them. The name you use reveals the stance. Counted here from the Deep Solstice as an astronomical order.

#	Season	Liturgical	Says	Worn / common	Holds
1	Winter	Nethael (neth-AYL)	“the night made whole”	Nethel / the Deep	the Deep Solstice
2	Winter	Brenorn (bren-ORN)	“hearth-land”	Brennor / Hearth-month	midwinter hush; deathless account-closing finishes
3	Winter → Spring	Liren (LEER-en)	“the thaw’s speech”	Liren / the Thaw	water runs again
4	Spring	Saelorn (SAY-lorn)	“sowing-land”	Salorn / Seed-month	first green
5	Spring	Haelren (HAYL-ren)	“hale-speech”	Hailren / Hale-month	the land sound
6	Summer	Eolthael (ay-ohl-THALE)	“the Tree’s hinge”	Yoltal / Turning-month	the High Solstice · Turning-Week
7	Summer	Vaelorn (VAY-lorn)	“gift-land”	Valorn / Gift-month	after-Turning; the colours settle
8	Summer	Leddorn (led-ORN)	“reckoning-land”	Leddorn / Ledger-month	late-summer markets, contract-terms

When the year starts — three new-year days by stance

The devout and the clergy begin the year at Eolthael — the Turning is the hinge that matters. Lestrand and the deathless houses begin it at Nethael — midwinter is when the books close. Vaethorn follows the clergy in the pulpit and the last actual Turning-Week in the fields (a child “turns the year” when the local Tree last managed a fall). Same twelve names; three new-year’s days. A disputed date is a campaign lever.

Kumbaan’s moons

Kumbaan does not use this table. The Yumboe keep twelve named moons, lunar, owing the solstice nothing:

Yaaba · Ndibi · Sambiyo · Waandi · Lunji · Saalo · Soonke · Nkoosa · Ndenjoo · Yendo · Njili · Mbela

A mainlander will try to line Saalo up with Seed-month and be cheerfully, consistently wrong. That mismatch is the tell.

How years are numbered

Months name a season. Years have no universal number. Same lever as the three new-year’s days, turned toward history: the count you write on a debt is a theology. Full spine in Part: The Ages.

- First Seat / devout clerks count Cut-years from the First Cut (liturgical: the Eoloren-count). Present: Cut-year 387.
- Lestrand and the deathless houses count from a house-founding or a note-issue (“the 200th summer of the White Note”).
- Vaethorn counts from the year our graft took — the same local-fall logic as their new-year.
- The Watching refuse the Cut-count. Kumbaan keeps moons and owes the ages nothing.

The Awakening Tree is old beyond reliable dating. There is no year the world began, and no year she appeared.

How it is lived along the gradient

The reckoning is universal in principle (one sun, one moon, the two solstices) but lived differently along the reach-gradient:

- Maiethorn (full reach): Turning-Week is a near-certainty and a vast institution — dense healthy Trees, nearly every child Given, the pilgrimage to Thaeloren cresting at the High Solstice. Lived shape of that pilgrimage, when it was required: the Walking Years (the Near Mile).

- Strandoren (high reach): the solstice is kept, but as much a commercial calendar-hinge (fairs, contract-terms, the deathless houses' reckoning) as a sacred one.
 - Heskoren (thin reach): Turning-Week is a hard-won event of a decade, not a certainty — a child may travel days to the nearest turning Tree, or wait years for a graft to take. The solstice still turns; the gift may not fall. Whole districts are still on the Long Mile.
 - Kumbaan (no reach): the Yumboes keep the moon, not the solstice — a nocturnal, lunar reckoning owing nothing to the Trees, because they have none. The one people in the world whose calendar the Leaf-Mother never touched.

The Ages

People in this world do not live in “the Fourth Age.” They keep two overlapping clocks, and which one they glance at tells you where they stand.

Clock 1 — How you Turned (personal, generational). Did you walk to Thaeloren (or to a neighbour who had already walked), or did you stand under a town graft? Ordinary families date themselves this way: we are a Hands-house; grandmother still talks of the road. A Long-Lived who says “I walked” is dating the room.

Clock 2 — Where the wood has reached (geographic, unfinished). The Grafting is not a closed golden age. It is a wave of living wood that started at the origin, filled Maiethorn, crossed to Strandoren by sea, and is still arriving on Heskoren. Kumbaan is off the wave entirely. Present-day thin reach is not “history’s scar.” It is the front of a process that has not finished.

Both clocks sit on an unnamed preface: Before the Walk. The Tree was already there. No honest count starts it.

This is not a civilizing mission and not a golden age of pilgrimage that grafts then “improved.” The Walking Years were a logistics problem that killed children on the road. The Grafting was horticulture that people later sanctified. The Seat now narrates both as her will travelling. Folk memory is less tidy. Keep the romance and the graves in the same sentence.

The ages at a glance

	Everyday	Liturgical	Says	What it is
Preface	Before the Walk	(mostly unnamed) · the Watching keep the Before	—	The Tree already stood. Kinds, doors, and seeing without a mother’s name. Uncounted on purpose.
Clock 1, old default	the Walking Years	Brenvaeth (bren-VAYTH)	“the hearth gone to waiting”	You walked to Thaeloren or you stayed Kept for want of the trip. Far lands ran heavy on the Kept and the Struck.
The hinge	the First Cut	Eoloren (ay-ohl-OR-en)	“the witnessed hinge”	Someone cut living wood and it took . Who, is argued. That it happened, is not.
Clock 2	the Grafting	(process, not an age you exit)	—	The carrying of hands. Still unfinished at the Sundered Reach. Never crossed the storm-wall.
Clock 1, new default	the Years of Hands	Ornthaeth (orn-THALE)	“Tree-land”	A town Tree is the ordinary way to Turn. Pilgrimage remains — as devotion, prestige, or necessity where a graft has failed.

The liturgical pair is a deliberate inversion of the Road-hands’ own name. Thaelvaeth is “the Tree gone to the waiting” — wood carried out. Brenvaeth is “the hearth gone to the waiting” — people walking in. The Grafting is the moment the world stopped sending hearths to the Tree and started sending the Tree to hearths.

How years are numbered

There is no universal year-zero. Same twelve months; three new-year’s days. Same past; four honest ways to count it. The number you write on a debt is a theology.

Who	What they count from	What it sounds like
First Seat / devout clerks	the First Cut — Cut-years (liturgical: the Eoloren-count)	“the 387th Cut-year”
Threnmaieth	Cut-years and a crown-count	a number that wants to be a roll
Lestrand / deathless houses	a house-founding , a note-issue, a contract-term	“the 200th summer of the White Note”
Vaethorn	the year our graft took — or the last actual Turning-Week	a child “turns the year” when the local Tree last managed a fall the Watching	they refuse the Cut-count	the overlay is not an epoch; the Tree was already seeing the Old Ways	a closed door, a drowning-year, a guest that took	the Hands are when guests arrived, not when history began
Kumbaan	moons	the mainland ages are a sailor’s chart they do not owe

Present: Cut-year 387 — the 387th summer since the First Cut. Shorthand C.Y. 387. Not a round number on purpose.

What you may not date. The Awakening Tree is old beyond reliable dating. Before the Walk has no start. Who made the First Cut stays contested.

Spread of the wave

Cut-years	Where the wood went
C.Y. 0	the First Cut — near Thaeloren, Maiethorn
C.Y. 0–80	Maiethorn filling. Origin-towns first; the Rain-Shadow slower.
C.Y. 40–160	Strandoren by sea — wealthy coasts first, deep interior later.
C.Y. 200–387	Heskoren — still incomplete. Luckiest towns have had a local Turning for a few generations; whole districts still wait.
never	Kumbaan

A freshly planted scion still takes a generation to hold a Leaf-Fall. So “a graft arrived” and “this town Turns under its own canopy” are twenty years apart. Heskoren’s waiting is not only the queue. It is the queue plus the childhood of the wood.

What the two clocks did

Law. Citizenship-by-local-witness is a Hands-era default. In the Walking Years the town that saw you Turn was the crowd under Thaeloren — or no one, if you never arrived. Far children who stayed Kept were not “unmarked on a roll”; they were unwitnessed as Given because they did not make the trip. Vouching-at-a-distance (a Long-Lived who remembers the origin-fall, a Bound word, a Far-Voiced feeling) was invented to carry the origin’s witness home. The unvouched Struck are older than the grafts: a becoming on a far threshold was always unwitnessed. The Grafting did not invent that unease. It localized who is expected to have been seen.

Money. Many deathless houses began as road-houses — inns, endowments, and century-credit for families who had to walk. When the walk stopped being required in the core, the houses still had Long-Lived memory of every debtor on the road, and paper that outlived the pilgrimage-season. They became banks. The endow-not-inherit loop is older than the Hands; the trusted note is a Walking-era instrument that outlived its road. Present banking was not designed last week.

Clergy. Cutting-leave is how the First Seat captured a practice that began without it. The first successful cut was argued as theft, as mercy, as the Tree offering a branch, as old horticulture the Motherfaith later named. The Seat won the authorization. The scion-queue is the Grafting’s child — the bottleneck that appears when her reach can travel but someone still decides which town next. Spreading Trees did not make society kind. It made a queue.

Language. The pilgrimage was a conserving pull. Once a year the far-flung walked to the same grove and heard the same liturgy, so the Old Tongue stayed nearer itself along the road. Local Trees let daughters grow in place. This is why drift tracks Tree-thinness and why Lestrane eroded so far so fast: trade, a local canopy, and no need to walk to the Motherwood. The three daughter-drifts are Hands-era weather sitting on a Walking-era root.

Geography. The reach-gradient is the wave, frozen at C.Y. 387. Maiethorn is old Hands. Strandoren is mature Hands with a commercial aftertaste. Heskoren is the Grafting this decade. Kumbaen never entered the clocks. In-world this reads as distance-and-history (true as far as it goes).

Faith. The Watching remember Before the Walk as the Before — seeing without a mother’s name — and will not start history at a Cut. The Old Ways were already becoming before any pilgrim road; the Hands are when guests arrived late. The Fair Hand dates contracts from a signing, not from a wound in wood; the Grafting is a supply-chain fact. The Open Table owes the ages nothing.

What a traveller notices

- A Long-Lived who says I walked, and a room that goes quiet — Clock 1, spoken as biography.
- A mile-shrine on a road that now ends at a town Tree: a stone for a Turning that no longer has to happen there. The devout still leave a ribbon. The town children climb it.
- Empty pilgrim-beds in an old inn's upper room, let now to merchants. The deathless house that owns the inn still dates its notes from the founding-summer the beds were full.
- Three dates for one summer, written on one debt: a Cut-year, a house-year, a “year the graft took.”
- A Heskoren hamlet whose ten-year-olds still walk to a neighbour. They are not doing history. They are doing this year.
- A Phoenix named as an era-marker — the Phoenix of the last Walking summer — without anyone agreeing which summer that was.

A clerk's query (C.Y. 387)

Ledan of the White Note, to the Speaker who keeps the Eoloren-count. The verso has been folded around a second number.

The house writes a century-loan from our founding-summer, which we call the 200th of the White Note. The debtor in Wethorn writes the same summer as the year their graft took. Your college will write it as the 280th Cut-year if I have the conversion right, and as the 279th if I have it wrong.

Which number should stand on the note so that in fifty years the same person still owes us? We do not ask which summer was holy. We ask which summer a court will still be able to find.

The clerk cannot afford to see that the three numbers are three theologies. The Speaker who answers (if they answer) will name a wood. The Vaethorn debtor will name a taking. The loan will still come due.

The unnamed preface. The Awakening Tree already stood. People already had Kinds. Some already became things at doors the later faith would struggle to place. This era is kept thin on purpose — the inscrutable fifth of the past. There is no date. The Tree is old beyond reliable dating. Kept thin — no creation myth, no first king. The Watching keep the Before.

Most of the world does not have a name for this. The devout skip it. Skeptics call it “before anyone bothered to walk,” which is a shrug, not a chronicle.

The Watching keep the one lived name: the Before. In their telling the world was Kind and Kind alone, then the Tree was already there, watching. The Giving came after the Watching. The Mother-name came after that. Each layer is a story laid over a seeing.

The Old Ways do not grant that becoming waited on a road. Heskoren’s people already crossed doors — drowning, grove, stone — before any pilgrim mile. The Walking Years, when they arrived as a foreign traffic, were not the beginning of history. They were the beginning of company.

The Open Table is not in this clock. Kumbaan’s hill-history does not owe Thaeloren a preface.

What can be said without inventing kings:

- The origin Tree is the one Tree no one grafted from another. It was not planted in a remembered summer.
- Far from it, people lived as they lived. Some were Struck at thresholds because thresholds exist. Some were never either Given or Struck, because there was no local fall to miss.
- When people organized the tenth-year trip, the Walking Years began. That organization is the start of Clock 1, not the start of the world.

None dated. That is the point. A later chronicle that “discovers” a first king, a first war, or a first sermon in this era is doing the overlay the Watching warned about.

The Walking Years

Once there was only the Awakening Tree, and a child’s tenth-year Turning meant a walk to it. Families who could not make the trip stayed Kept for want of it, so the far reaches ran heavy on the Kept and the Struck as the rule, not an edge-case. Everyday name: the Walking Years. Liturgical: Brenvaeth (bren-VAYTH) — “the hearth gone to the waiting.”

In these years the divine was not local. The Leaf-Fall happened in one grove, on Maiethorn, under Thaeloren. A tenth summer was a journey or it was a hug you never received because you were not there to be hugged.

The far-flung who stayed home were not “skipped by a goddess” in any way a town could prove. They were children who did not walk. Some were later Struck at a drowning, an oath, a death — unwitnessed, because the only crowd that counted was a continent away. Some stayed Kept for life, wanted or not, because want-of-a-trip is not a theology, it is a distance.

This is the historical origin of today's pattern, stated mundanely: thin reach used to mean far from the one Tree. After the First Cut, thin reach came to mean Tree-poor places — young, sick, or few grafts — which is why a hamlet next-door to a dying scion can be “far” in the old sense without being far on a map.

The pilgrimage did not vanish when grafts began. It changed jobs. In the Years of Hands the devout still walk to the origin; the poor and the Tree-bereaved still walk to a neighbour. The Walking Years are the time when everyone who Turned as Given had walked, or had been carried.

The later romance of the old mile is a Hands-era feeling laid on Walking-era graves. Keep both in the same sentence.

The era has no dated start (it grows out of Before the Walk when the trip becomes the way to Turn). It has a dated hinge: the First Cut (C.Y. 0). After that the Walking Years cease to be the default in lands the wood has reached, and remain the default in lands it has not. Heskoren is still, in places, in this era. That is not a metaphor.

The door is one week

Turning-Week is the week bracketing the High Solstice in Eolthael. Every child who has turned ten since the last High Solstice Turns that week, under Thaeloren, or they do not Turn as Given at all.

Miss the week and the door has shut. An eleven-year-old at the origin the following summer is a visitor. The Tree's Given-door is the tenth-year cohort, not a standing appointment. Struck doors still open later, elsewhere, with no leaf and no crowd. That is a different mercy, and it was always the far lands' other path.

This is why families from any distance left early, and why the richest or most frightened far households spent a year at the origin: a nine-year-old wintered in a road-house so they could not miss. The held-over child is the expensive mercy. Everyone else gambled one summer.

Three walks, not one road

Named in the common tongue, because the walk was logistics before it was liturgy.

Walk	Who used it	How long	What it cost the Near Mile	Maiethorn inland, anyone already on the Motherland	days to a couple of weeks	a harvest-timing; almost everyone who meant to come, came the Salt Walk	Strandoren — ship the inner sea, then the Near Mile	a sailing plus the inland days	a berth in fair weather; miss the last crossing and you miss the year
the Long Mile	Heskoren, and the Strandoren interior before the coasts were rich	weeks to months	a year's surplus, or a road-house note, or you did not go

People did not say Brenvaeth on the road. They said we are on the Long Mile, or we took the salt. Vaethorn still calls the whole past the waiting-road. Lestrand files it as the road-years. Threnmaieth wants the miles on a roll.

Timing against the year. Near-Mile families left in Haelren or early Eolthael and were home by Vaelorn. Salt-Walk households watched the inner sea from Saelorn; a late storm in Hale-month was a Kept child. Long-Mile columns left in Liren or Saelorn — the thaw, the first green — and hoped the High Solstice had not happened without them. Some arrived in Leddorn with a ten-year-old who had already missed. The road-houses knew that silence. They did not charge extra for it. They also did not refund the note.

Who could afford it

The Near Mile was a civic season: whole towns moved a short way together, and a poor child walked in a neighbour's dust. Cost was real (lost labour, a week of food) and rarely decisive.

The Salt Walk sorted by cash and weather. Coastal wealth bought berths. Interior Strandoren was already “far” in these years, even though the coasts would later be Tree-rich. A family might send the Turning-child and one adult, and leave the rest. Guilds sometimes advanced a berth against a future colour — a Given Answered or Far-Voiced was worth the loan; a hug was a debt with no new trade in it. The Fair Hand would later call this a term. In Brenvaeth it was just the quay.

The Long Mile sorted by whether you could lose a year. Food, shoes, a second adult if you had one, and the note you signed at the first road-house that would take it. Many could not. Those who could often could not for every child.

The split household is the era's ordinary cruelty. A family with three children near ten could sometimes walk one. The one who walked might come home Given. The ones who stayed were Kept, or were Struck later at a local door, and grew up in the same kitchen as a sibling the origin had seen. No one needed a theology for this. Distance did it. Vaethorn's later guilt (we wait because we are unworthy) is a Hands-era reading of that fact. History does not agree with the guilt.

Old Ways households on Heskoren often refused the walk on purpose. Their children were already the land's. Motherfaith neighbours read those children as Kept-for-want, which is a misreading the walk itself cannot correct. Both families are telling the truth they have.

Who died

Children died on the road. So did the adults who carried them. River-crossings in the thaw, a fever in a packed Near-Mile inn, a late squall on the inner sea, hunger on a Long-Mile stretch between hearths, a birth that would not wait for the grove. This is not a slaughter-age and not a hymn. It is a logistics problem that killed people, which is what long roads do.

The graves are mostly unmarked at first. Then someone sets a stone at a day's walk, because the next column needs to know the water, and because a name should sit somewhere. A ribbon goes on the stone the year after. A later column uses the stone as a mile-mark. The romance and the graves are the same object seen at two hours of the day.

A child who dies on the way to be witnessed may Strike as Returned on the road — a becoming with no crowd, on the way to the only crowd that counted. Rare. Remembered. The ~5% edge lives here, not in the Leaf-Fall waiting at the end of the walk.

The origin also filled with children who arrived and had no one to walk home with. Road-houses took some in (a bed that became a life). Origin-towns took some. A Given child with no one to carry the witness home is the other half of the grave: they lived, and belonging still had to be invented for them.

Far reaches as the rule

In Brenvaeth, a land far from Thaeloren was Kept-heavy and Struck-heavy because most ten-year-olds never stood under the canopy. That was not a frontier curiosity. It was how the world worked anywhere the walk was too far or too dear.

- Given were the ones who had been there — a minority that shrank with distance. They came home as specialists the town could not otherwise grow, and as people the town had not seen become.
- Kept were the default far childhood: whole, untithed, unwitnessed-as-Given. Some were wanted that way. Some were the price of a summer the family could not raise. Some were Old Ways children the Motherfaith had misfiled.

- Struck were the far lands' other door, and always had been. Drownings, oaths, deaths. No leaf. No origin-crowd. The unease that follows the Struck is older than the grafts; the walk only made it louder, because the Given in the same town had been seen, a continent away.

When the wood later travelled, this pattern relocated. A Tree-poor pocket next to a dying scion reads the same on a census and is not far on a map. Clock 2. Today's Heskoren is not a re-enactment of Brenvaeth. Some of it still is Brenvaeth, this year, for this cohort. Some of it is a neighbour's canopy and a queue. Both can be true on the same road.

Institutions of the road

There was no travelling church with offices. The Tree-Wardens as a graft-carrying order is Hands-era weather. In Brenvaeth the origin-hearth was the only Speaking that counted; far towns had no Tree to tend. What the road had was inns, stones, and summer traffic.

Mile-shrines

A mile-shrine is a stone at about a day's walk. Water if the ground allows. A flat top for a pack. Often a name. Often a ribbon.

They begin as graves and waymarks in the same act — you bury someone where the column had to stop, and the next year the stop is the place you aim for. The devout later leave ribbons for the Tree. Children later climb them. Hands-towns later argue about pulling them down because the road now ends at a local canopy and the stone is “in the way.” The stone does not know which story it is in.

A ribbon is not a leaf-colour. People tie what they have. A copper-green scrap on a Long-Mile stone does not mean a Taken-In died there. Travellers who have walked once know this. Travellers who have only heard the romance do not.

Road-houses

Many deathless houses began here. In Brenvaeth they were road-houses: beds, porridge, a dry room, and credit for a walk you could not miss twice.

Everyday name: road-house. Cant: brenhael (bren-HAYL) — bren + hael, “the hearth kept whole.” Vaethorn says waiting-hearth. Lestrang says the bed-house (and still means the bank). Threnmaieth would like them on the roll.

What a road-house actually sold:

- A bed in the two crowded months, and a quieter one in the other ten. Held-over nine-year-olds were the winter trade. Empty pilgrim-beds in a Hands-era upper room used to be this.

- A note. You eat now; you pay at the origin, or on the way home, or when the child is grown, or when a sibling walks next year. The Long-Lived innkeeper forgets none of it. That memory is why the paper will outlive the pilgrimage-season and become the trusted note. In the act, it is an innkeeper who will still know your name in fifty years, which is a kindness and a leash.
- A little Tithe-furnishing, improvised, not a guild. A green-lot behind the house for a Taken-In parent. A shed where a Far-Voiced can cry without taking the dormitory with them. The road itself is novelty enough that a Long-Lived innkeeper's own Tithe stays fed — which is why the deathless stayed in the trade, and why the same people later endow libraries: the hunger that kept them on the mile is the hunger that built the archive. Brenvaeth had a pot and a shed.
- A held bed. A family said they would come. They did not. The innkeeper keeps the bed a year, then two, then as a habit that looks like hospitality and functions as a shrine.

The White Note's founding-summer is a house-year, not a Cut-year. In the Walking Years that house was a hearth with too many boots by the door. This is the same fortune, earlier.

Summer traffic

For two months the Near Mile is a moving town: columns, dust, Far-Voiced cries from ridge to ridge (the road is full; the ford is wrong; a child is down), Two-Bodied ranging the edges because the ranging is the Tithe and the column is a herd. Markets grow at the mile-shrines and vanish when Eolthael ends. Then the road is empty and local, and the road-house counts notes.

There were no pilgrim-knights and no official convoy-guild. People walked with whoever left the same week. A Bound's word might hold a column together for a fortnight. A Kept adult with no Tithe to manage was, then as now, the person who could carry the extra pack.

Witness at the origin, or not at all Citizenship-by-local-witness is Hands-era weather. In Brenvaeth the town that saw you Turn was the crowd under Thaeloren — or no one.

- Going home did not bring the crowd with you. Your village had not watched. Belonging at home required someone who had been under the boughs to stand for you: a parent, a neighbour from the column, a Long-Lived who keeps origin-falls the way they later keep town-falls. Vouching-at-a-distance was invented to carry the origin's witness home. The three pillars (Long-Lived memory, Bound word, Far-Voiced feeling) are older than the grafts; the job of carrying a far Turning is Walking-era.
- A Given child with no surviving witness is legally thin in the place they grew up. Origin-orphans, road-house children, a Bound stranger who will swear the colour they did not see (and cannot cheaply lie). The unvouched are older than the Struck-stigma, and include people the Tree did Give.

- Struck on the road are a double unease: unwitnessed becoming, on the way to the witnessing. A Returned child walking the last Near-Mile days beside the parent who has not yet forgiven the threshold.
- Staying home meant you were never Given-witnessed. You were still of your town, because your town had watched you be a child. Kept-by-distance is not “unmarked on a roll.” It is a hug that happened without you, a continent away.

The origin-crowd was enormous in Eolthael and ordinary the rest of the year. Speakers of the origin-hearth named colours until their voices went. Folk-known colours still were; the warden’s word made them count for people who would have to carry that word home.

Long-Lived who still say I walked

A Long-Lived who says I walked is dating the room. Memory is perfect. Meaning is not. There is no single Long-Lived account.

At present (C.Y. 387) the sentence does at least four jobs, and they argue:

- I walked as a child, under Thaeloren, before my town had wood. A Maiethorn deathless Given in the late Walking (the last core cohorts, before Maiethorn filled in the first Cut-years) is speaking of a summer most of the room has only as a ribbon. A Heskoren deathless may mean last decade. Same words. Different clocks.
- I walked the mile as the inn. A road-house Long-Lived may never have stood under the canopy as a pilgrim. They walked the same stretch every summer for two hundred years. They remember every debtor. They will not always tell you which children came back.
- I remember the graves and I will not call them holy. Skeptics among the deathless. The road was biology plus bad fords. They are sincere. They still tear up at a ribbon, which they will not explain.
- I remember the graves and I will not call them logistics. Devout deathless. Every stone was a waiting. They are sincere. They still know which ford killed which name, which they will tell you whether you asked or not.

Blood-Read will give you a true fragment of a walk. It will not tell you which of the four jobs the living speaker is doing. That fight is play.

They also disagree with Seat chronicles that start at the First Cut. A Long-Lived who walked as a child and a clerk who counts Cut-years will fight about the same summer. Both can be honest. Only one of them was there.

What a character notices

- Dust on a Near-Mile road in Hale-month, and none in Ledger-month.
- A mile-shrine with a ribbon and a climbing-scuff, and a Hands-child who does not know it was a grave.
- An inn's upper room with too many beds for the present trade. The house still dates its notes from a founding-summer the beds were full.
- A Held bed that has not been let in anyone's living mortal memory. The innkeeper can tell you the name. They will not tell you they think the child is dead, or Kept, or Old Ways, or never born.
- A sibling-pair, one Given, one Kept, who will not walk the same side of a road.
- A Far-Voiced ridge-cry in an old pattern: the ford is wrong. No column answers. Birds do.
- Someone at a table saying I walked, and the room sorting itself by who goes quiet.

A Turning-Week slate

From the third hearth on the Near Mile, kept by Thilim, who is Long-Lived and has kept this house since before the Cut, as later clerks would say. The verso is knife-scored with tally-marks that do not match the recto.

Eolthael, the summer the ford ran high.

Beds: forty-and-two spoken for. Notes out: Tora of the long cape, two mouths, pay on the home-walk. Valein of the salt, one mouth, paid at the quay. The Held: Seine of the far cape — tenth summer, not come. Hold the bed. The mother said next year. Next year was last year.

Porridge: enough. Shed: the blue-leaf girl from the second column cried the rafters quiet; no charge; we needed the quiet. Green-lot: used. The Taken-In man from the long cape left a cutting. I put it in the pot. It is not a Tree.

I do not ask which summer was holy. I ask which mouths will be here at dark. The Held bed is made. If Seine comes I will not have to remember I made it for nothing.

Thilim cannot afford to see that the Held bed is already a shrine, or that the house's fortune is the farness the wood will later abolish. The cutting in the pot is not a First Cut. It is a man who missed his green.

The First Cut

Someone cut living wood from Thaeloren (or from a branch that came away in a hand), carried it a day's earth, married it to new ground, and it took. A town on the Near Mile Turned, a generation later, under a canopy that was not the origin. Everyday name: the First Cut. Liturgical: Eoloren (ay-ohl-OR-en) — “the witnessed hinge.” The clerical count of years starts here.

Everyone agrees a first successful town-graft occurred. It happened within a day's living-earth of Thaeloren — close enough that a cut could still be green when it met new ground. That is horticulture, not theology. No two houses agree whose story the cut is.

The first green is not named. Folk who need an object call it the nameless green. Naming the town would pick a hearth, and a hearth would pick a hand.

A freshly planted scion still takes a generation to hold a Leaf-Fall. So C.Y. 0 is a wound in wood. The first local Turning is about twenty summers later. “A graft arrived” and “this town Turns under its own canopy” are never the same year. The wave is slow because each Hand must grow up before it can be a source.

The five attributions

The five stories are not speeches. They are jobs. Which one a room is doing is a faster read than a creed. They are not collapsed into a secret true cutter.

Folk — the stolen branch

A parent who would not watch another child stay Kept for want of a trip, or would not bury another child on the Near Mile, took wood without leave. Mercy as theft.

- The nameless knife is the object, not a saint. Some hearths keep a kitchen-knife on a ribbon the way Hands-children climb mile-shrines: they cannot say whether they are honouring a theft or a gift. There is no name on the handle.
- Thief-songs on the Near Mile are walking-songs with the cutter as we. Salt-Walk versions make it a quay-joke (the first unpaid berth). Long-Mile versions are not funny. Vaethorn's later guilt wants this parent to have been unworthy. The songs do not agree.
- Folk-right cutting did not vanish when the Seat wrote a leave. A Taken-In with a sick neighbour and no year to wait will still take a slip. Most of those slips die. The ones that take are how the queue learns it is not the only horticulture in the world. Road-hands call this a problem. Towns that lived through a stolen year call it a year they Turned.

The later Cutting-leave fee is, in this telling, a fine that forgot it was a fine. Lestrand will broker it without blushing. That is not a different story. That is this story with a clerk.

What this mouth cannot afford to see: that a stolen Hand still left a town behind that did not get the next one.

Clergy — the warden ahead of the college

A tree-warden of a Near-Mile hearth cut with a leave that did not yet exist. The wood took. The origin-hearth spent the generation of argument (C.Y. 0 into the first local Leaf-Fall) trying to decide whether this was blight, theft, or rite. The First Seat as a Cutting-leave desk is what that argument left on the ground. The Road-hands are this scandal in an office: the people who walk what used to be unsanctioned.

- Speakers who will not say first. They will say the witnessed hinge. They will date a note. They will not point at a grave. Some of them are skeptics who grant the horticulture and refuse the saint. Some of them are devout who think naming a cutter would steal the Tree's offering. Same silence, two jobs.
- The quiet years at the origin. After the first copy, the Motherwood tried to forbid further cuts. Wood died in pots anyway. Neighbours cut anyway. Forbidding a copy that had already taken is how a college learns it does not own the Tree's tissue, only the authorization.
- Road-hands as regularized heresy. They were not designed as a travelling church. They are the generation of argument, given a cart.

What this mouth cannot afford to see: that “we will write how, not who” is how a heresy becomes a monopoly.

Devout — the Tree offered

A branch came away. No theft, no genius — a Hand giving a Hand. The Mother (or the Tree, if you will not say Mother) meant the wood to travel. This is the version the Seat prefers in sermons, because it makes the scion-queue sound like stewardship rather than rationing.

- Eoloren sermons at Turning-Week in the Motherwood: she sent her hands outward so the hearths could stay. The graves of the Walking Years are named in the same breath, on a good day. On a bad day they are not.
- The watering-words as proof. If the marrying-rite were only horticulture, why would the wood listen? Skeptics: because you watered it. Both can stand under the same canopy.
- Cutting-leave as blessing. Vaethorn calls it the wood's blessing. The devout need that name. Without it the queue is a list of who waits.

What this mouth cannot afford to see: that “she meant the wood to travel” is how you narrate a wave that went to paying coasts before it went to the poor far. The thing saved, when anything was, was a walk — and not everyone's.

The Watching — horticulture, then an overlay

People had always been able to cut living wood. Fruit-grafts, orchard-kin, a slip in a pot. The Motherfaith later named one cut the First, and started a count, which is what overlays do. The Tree was already seeing. A date does not make a mother.

- They refuse the Cut-count. A Watcher clerk will date a debt from a house-year, a drowning-year, a night they kept. They will convert to Eoloren-count if a court makes them, and they will not call it history.
- Pear-grafts as the tell. Watcher hearths on Maiethorn still graft ordinary fruit in the same week a Road-hand passes with carrying-earth. They do not think this is a joke. They think it is the whole argument, done with hands.
- The withheld first. Same cadence as the withheld blessing. What was cut, was seen. What took, was seen. The Tree does not reach twice by chance. No Mother in it. No epoch in it.

What this mouth cannot afford to see: that refusing the date does not refuse the wave. Children still died on the road until the copies took. The overlay is a name. The graves were not.

The Old Ways — the land received a guest

No one “cut” in the Seat’s sense. A grove took in kin. The Hands are when guests began arriving from the east. Host-rights start here, not a college’s warrant.

- The first meal for a new graft — food left at the planting, the way you feed a guest before you ask their business. The Door-Keepers still do this. A Road-hand who eats is doing host-courtesy whether the Seat wrote it down or not. A Road-hand who plants and leaves is a claiming.
- Guest-reading vs First-reading. A Guest-reading town will pilgrimage and keep the meal. A First-reading district will tend the same wood as a guest in their house and still refuse the Tender’s blessing. Both start the story at a receiving, not at a knife. The Cut is a mainland word for an arrival.
- They do not start history at C.Y. 0. On Heskoren the guests arrive in the C.Y. 200s. Calling that “late” is already Motherfaith. Calling it “the First Cut, delayed” is a Seat map. The land was already making children at the old doors.

What this mouth cannot afford to see: that a guest who takes a generation to speak (the first local Leaf-Fall) will still be called a Tree by the children who Turn under it. Host-rights do not stop a town from becoming Hands-era.

All five are playable. Skeptics grant the horticulture (observable) and deny the conclusion (that a mind chose the travelling). The Fair Hand is not a sixth attribution of the cut; they enter when the wood boards a ship. The Open Table is not in this story.

The generation of argument

C.Y. 0 is a cut. The next twenty summers are copies, dead wood, a college that cannot un-cut, and a first local Leaf-Fall that ends the argument without settling it.

What people actually did.

- Near-Mile towns cut because the first green was visible from the next square. Living tissue, a day's earth, a pot, a Taken-In who knew soil. This is why the origin-towns filled first. Not worthiness. Distance a sapling can survive.
- Most early copies died. Mortal wood, wrong season, a pot that dried on the Near Mile in Hale-month, a well-meant slip with no carrying-earth. The deaths are why the Seat could tell itself the first taking was a fluke, for a while.
- The origin-hearth tried forbidding. Speakers named it theft, blight, a wound in the First Hand. Neighbours cut anyway. A prohibition with no riders cannot police a day's walk in a pre-print world.
- Proof arrived as a ceremony. When the nameless green held its first Turning-Week, a colour fell (or a hug — the tellings do not agree, and it does not change the paper). A town that was not the origin had been seen seeing. Clock 1 flipped for that hearth. Citizenship-by-local-witness is born as weather in that square, a generation after the knife. The Walk is no longer the only door. The Seat can argue doctrine until the leaves fall. It cannot argue the leaves back onto Thaeloren.

What the Seat captured.

The college could not own the tissue. It could own who may cut next. That is the copy-right. Cutting-leave is the paper. The scion-queue is what a copy-right becomes when demand outruns a generation of wood.

The fee is framed as carrying-earth and a Road-hand's year. Folk hear a fine. Lestrang hears a licence. Threnmaith wants it on a roll. Vaethorn calls it an offering. Same coin, four stances. Historically it is how an institution absorbed a heresy and called it horticulture. Unsanctioned cutting became authorized cutting. The practice survived by changing owner.

Road-hands are not a second order. They are the people you send when you have claimed the knife and still need the wood to walk.

Spreading Trees did not make society kind. They made a queue. Struck stigma, Tithe-leverage, the pitied Kept — none of that dissolved when a second canopy opened. The new injustice is which town next, paid in twenty more years of borrowed Turnings. She did not write the list. People did.

How the wave moved

A scion still takes a generation to Turn. A healthy town Tree may supply the next cut, acting on the origin's behalf. So the wave is a chain of maturing Hands, not a miracle crate. Sea can jump a chain. A Long-Mile cart cannot, until carrying-earth lasts and there are rest-hearths that are not just pilgrim-inns.

Maiethorn — C.Y. 0–80 (origin-towns first; Rain-Shadow slower)

The Near Mile becomes unnecessary as requirement in the core, town by town, as canopies come of age. Origin-squares first: a day's earth, then two, then a valley. The pilgrimage remains — devotion at Thaeloren, and necessity wherever a graft has not yet spoken.

The Rain-Shadow is slower on purpose. Same continent, thin soil, wells, sand-country. A cut that takes in the Sacred Core dies in the dry hills unless a Taken-In and a lucky year agree. This is not unworthiness and not a different gospel. It is dirt. Fox of the Sands hearths still walk west toward Thaeloren after coastal squares have already stopped. Clock 2 on one continent at two speeds.

Seat narration: her hands filled the Motherland. Folk memory: we stopped burying children on the Near Mile where the wood took, and we did not stop where it didn't. Both sentences can be said in the same market.

By C.Y. 80 the Motherland is old Hands in the core and still waiting in pockets. That leftover waiting is why a Maiethorn hamlet can still send this year's ten-year-olds to a neighbour without being "historical."

Strandoren — C.Y. 40–160, by sea (wealthy coasts first, interior later)

The inner sea already knew how to move a child. Moving a Hand is the same berth with worse instructions: living earth, do not stow below, water at dawn, a Taken-In or a Road-hand who sleeps beside the pot.

Why the sea starts while Maiethorn is still filling (C.Y. 40). A ship is faster than filling every inland hamlet. A wealthy coast can pay a Cutting-leave and a Salt-Walk crew in the same summer a Near-Mile village is still on the Seat's list. The wave went where ships and fees went.

Coasts first. Port-cities take. Deep interior waits on river-days and a cart, which is a small Long Mile. Strandoren's later high reach and worn faith are not a paradox: the wood arrived as cargo, and cargo does not require a mother. The Fair Hand dates the carrying as a supply-chain fact. They will attend a planting as witnesses to a signing. They will not start history at a wound in wood. The first carrying is their name for Eoloren, and they mean a bill of lading.

What the Salt Walk becomes. When a coast Turns under its own canopy, the berth stops being a tenth-year necessity and becomes a luxury, a contract-hinge, a devout extra. Road-houses on the inland days lose a season of boots and keep the notes.

By C.Y. 160 the Shore-lands are mature Hands on the water and still patchy inland. Lestrand files the whole motion as the carrying. They are not wrong about the ships.

The gap (why Heskoren waits until C.Y. 200)

Not unworthiness. Three stacked frictions:

1. Wood dies on the Long Mile. Weeks to months. A day's earth is a Near-Mile problem. A ship's hold is a solved Salt-Walk problem if you water it. A cart between hearths in thaw-mud is how scions become sticks. Until carrying-earth lasts, and until there are rest-hearths whose job is wood, not pilgrims, Heskoren cannot be a circuit. Road-hands as a standing office had to exist before the far could be a route rather than a funeral of saplings.
2. The chain has to grow up. You cut from the origin, or from a healthy town Tree. Maiethorn's first generation of sources come of age in the C.Y. 20s–40s. Strandoren's coastal Hands are not ready to be sources until later still. You cannot skip to the sundered reach without a mature link, unless you spend origin-wood on a death-march. The Seat did not, mostly. That is horticulture and it is also a choice about who is next.
3. The queue prefers a paying next. After the coasts, carrying-earth is committed to interiors, replacements, sick Trees — the quiet work that does not look like a wave. Heskoren is poor, far, and already accused (by a later guilt-theology) of waiting because it deserved to. History's job is to refuse that sentence. They waited because the wood was slow, the road was long, and the list was written in the Motherwood.

Vaethorn will preach we wait because we are unworthy. The gap is the evidence they use. The chronicle does not agree.

Heskoren — C.Y. 200–387 (still incomplete)

The frontier coast faces the sea back toward Strandoren; that is the lifeline of new grafts. Luckiest towns have had a local Turning for a few generations (a scion that arrived in the 200s and spoke in the 220s, or later). Whole districts still send children down the road — to a neighbour's new canopy, or, still, the Long Mile, if the neighbour is a stick in a pot.

This is Clock 2, present tense. Not a re-enactment of Brenvaeth. Some hamlets are in the Walking Years this year, for this cohort. Some are Hands-era one valley over. Both can be true on the same road. Vaethorn's waiting is the wave's front, not a metaphor for history.

Old Ways host-rights start here as a lived collision, not as a Maiethorn sermon. A graft in an old Taken-In green is a guest. A Cutting-leave is a mainland paper. The meal comes first, or the planting is a claiming.

Seat narration: her will is still travelling. Folk memory: the cart came late, the soil was called thin, the three hamlets past the ford can see Harrow's green from here. The Harrow-sentence is already how new towns talk. On Heskoren it is not nostalgia. It is the decade.

Kumbaan — never

No graft crossed the storm-wall. Road-hands do not bring the Mother over drowning sea. Sailors tell of pots that went into the water. Dead wood is not a Tree. The Open Table owes Eoloren nothing. Moons, not Cut-years.

Seat narration vs folk memory

	Seat / devout sermon	Folk memory (and the other houses)
The knife	She offered a Hand	Someone took one
The paper	Stewardship; horticulture	A fine that forgot; a licence; a warrant
The order of the wave	Her will travelling	Ships and fees, then the far
Heskoren's wait	Soil, timing, the Mother's pace	The list, the dead wood, the late cart
What was saved	The world received her	Children stopped dying on some roads

A Long-Lived who says I walked and a Speaker who keeps the Eoloren-count will fight about the same summer. A Long-Lived who planted — a Road-hand's long tenure, an innkeeper who watched pots replace children — will not always tell you which taking they think was holy. Memory is perfect. Meaning is not.

Spreading Trees did not abolish the unvouched Struck, the pitied Kept, guild conscription, or Tithe-leverage. They relocated who is expected to have been seen at ten. A Hands-town can still meet a feared Struck with a rope. A local canopy is not a solvent.

What a character notices

- A kitchen-knife on a ribbon in a Near-Mile house that will not name a saint.
- Watchers grafting pears in the same week a Road-hand waters carrying-earth.
- A first-meal bowl at a planting, licked clean by dogs, which the Seat did not write down.

- A ship's instruction, still copied: one living hand — do not stow below — water at dawn. The clerk who copies it files cargo.
- Three hamlets that can see a neighbour's canopy and are still on the queue. They have learned not to say queue.
- A Rain-Shadow child on the west-road after the core has stopped walking.
- Empty Salt-Walk berths in Eolthael, and a hold that still smells of wet earth out of season.
- A Long-Lived who planted and will not say I walked. Different job. Same quiet.

A minute of the First Seat

Attributed to the Speaker Rithnali, from the summer the nameless green held its first Turning-Week. Later clerks file it as Cut-year 19. The verso is a list of pots that died, which no one read aloud.

The wood that took within a day's earth of the First was cut without leave. We will not write who. We will write how, so the next cut does not kill what it carries.

Carry in living earth. Marry with the watering-words. Do not cut a second without the Seat. If the scion sickens, send word; do not take another wound in the First to hide the first.

The Tree does not reach twice by chance, and neither do we. From this summer a cut is a leave, or it is a theft we have decided not to chase. The towns that wait will wait on horticulture. The soil is thin in more places than it is not.

Rithnali cannot afford to see that “we will not write who” is the capture, or that “the soil is thin” is already a list. The pots on the verso are the argument the recto pretends to have closed. Folk who keep the nameless knife think this paper is a confession. The Seat thinks it is competence. Both can hold the same copy.

Consequences

- Clock 2 starts. The Grafting as a wave — wood carried outward, a generation to mature, Maiethorn first, Strandoren by sea, Heskoren last and live, Kumbaan never.
- Clock 1 flips where the wood has taken. Turning under a town canopy becomes the default. The pilgrimage remains, with a new job (devotion, prestige, or necessity when a graft fails).
- The Seat gains a bottleneck. Cutting-leave and the scion-queue are how an institution absorbed a heresy and called it horticulture. She did not write the queue.
- The clerical epoch. Cut-years begin. Other people do not have to care.
- Language and money. Local Trees let daughters grow in place; the road's conserving pull eases. Road-houses in the core lose pilgrim-seasons and keep the notes.

The Years of Hands

A town Turning Tree is the ordinary way to Turn where the wood has taken. Everyday name: the Years of Hands (also Since the Hands). Liturgical: Ornthael (orn-THALE) — “Tree-land.” The Grafting is not a previous age you exit; it is Clock 2 still moving.

This is the era the rest of the world lives in without naming it. Town Trees. Local Leaf-Fall. Citizenship because this town watched you. The pilgrimage to Thaeloren as an extra, not the only door.

It is also incomplete. Read the reach-gradient as a date, not as a finished map:

- Maiethorn — old Hands. Dense mature grafts. The Walking is biography for the deathless and a ribbon on a mile-shrine for everyone else — except in the Rain-Shadow, and except wherever a Tree has sickened. Old Hands can un-Hands. That is weather, not a fall of the age.
- Strandoren — mature Hands, worn faith. The road-houses finished becoming banks here. The walk is a luxury, a contract-hinge, and a hold that still smells of earth when a pot is the passenger.
- Heskoren — the Grafting this decade. Luckiest towns have had a local canopy for a few generations. Whole districts still send children down the road. Vaethorn’s waiting is not a metaphor for history. It is the wave’s front.
- Kumbaan — never. Off both clocks.

The pilgrimage did not vanish. It changed jobs. Institutions that survive by changing function are the texture of this era: the First Seat still authorizes cuts (now a queue); deathless houses still remember the road (now as credit); mile-shrines still stand (now as folklore, argument, and a thing children climb). The romance of the old mile is a Hands feeling. The graves are Walking facts. Keep both in the same square.

A child on the Long Mile this summer is not doing history.

The walk’s three jobs

In Brenvaeth the walk was how you Turned. In Ornthael it is three jobs that share roads, inns, and the one-week door, and do not share a reason.

Job	Who still walks	What they are buying	What they are not
Devotion — the extra mile	People who already have a local Tree and still want Thaeloren	an origin-fall; a ribbon at the First Hand; the Motherwood in Eolthael	necessity. They could have Turned at home.
Prestige — the First-Hand year	Lestrand money, a Bound signing-watch, a guild-ticket hinge, a wedding extra	being seen at the origin when you did not need to be; a held-over winter as a product	piety, unless it is also that. The Fair Hand will attend as witnesses to a signing.
Necessity — the neighbour's week (still the old mile when the neighbour is a continent)	Tree-poor, Tree-sick, Tree-young; a missed fall this year; Heskoren this cohort; the Rain-Shadow after the core stopped	a Given-door that is not at home	folklore. They are not re-enacting Brenvaeth. They are making the week.

People did not say Ornthael on the road. They said we are going to the Thallow, or we Turn at Harrow's, or the berth is for the child. Vaethorn still calls almost any walk the waiting-road. Lestrand files the extra as the First-Hand year and the need as the borrowed week. Threnmaieth wants the miles on a roll.

They share the Near Mile in Hale-month. A devotion-column, a prestige household with too much luggage, a necessity-family who sold a year, and a Road-hand going the other way with a pot, can sleep in the same upper room. The innkeeper can tell who is which. They will not always tell you. The Far-Voiced ridge-cry still works: the ford is wrong. Some of the mouths that answer are pilgrims. Some are carts of wood.

The inversion, lived. Thaelvaeth is wood carried out. Brenvaeth was hearths walking in. In the Years of Hands both directions are traffic. A Road-hand and a tenth-year pass on a bank and do not owe each other a sermon. That passing is the two clocks in one afternoon.

Hands can un-Hands. A town Tree that sickens, or that fails a fall, puts a Hands-town back on the neighbour's week. Clock 1 is not a one-way door. The present is not post-history even in the core. A sick Tree is Clock 2 weather that the Seat will call thin soil, and the town will call this year.

The one-week door did not loosen. Miss Eolthael and the Given-door has shut, at home or at the origin. Struck remains the later mercy. There is still no second-chance year. The held-over nine-year-old is still the expensive mercy — and on the prestige-walk it is also a winter you can buy.

Kumbaan is not on this table. No extra mile crosses the storm-wall.

Visible leftovers

What the Walking built, the Hands still sleep in. Adaptive reuse, not ruins. A leftover that is only a ruin is a Hands-town telling itself the road is over.

Mile-shrines (the stone in the square)

A mile-shrine is still a stone at about a day's walk — water, a flat top, often a name, often a ribbon. In a Hands-town the last one is frequently in the square, because the town grew around a graft planted beside the road, and the road's destination moved closer.

They are, at once:

- Graves. Walking facts. A Long-Lived who says I walked can still tell you which ford the name belongs to.
- Waymarks. Necessity-walkers still drink there. Road-hands still aim for the water.
- Folklore. Devotion leaves a ribbon. Hands-children climb.
- Argument. A warden wants it moved because it is in the way of the Leaf-Fall crowd. A house that still dates notes from a founding-summer wants it left. A neighbour who still walks wants it left for a different reason.

The stone does not know which story it is in. A ribbon is still not a leaf-colour.

Hands-towns that pull a stone down are doing theology with a hammer. They are not wrong that the road no longer has to happen there. They are wrong if they think the graves went with the requirement. The next necessity-column will miss the water.

The upper room (empty pilgrim-beds)

An old inn's upper room has too many beds for the present trade. In Brenvaeth they were the two crowded months. In Ornthael they are:

- Let to merchants — the White Note's conversion; occupancy as competence.
- Opened for Eolthael — devotion and prestige still swell a Near-Mile house for a fortnight.
- Held. A family said they would come. They did not. The innkeeper keeps the bed a year, then two, then as a habit that looks like hospitality and functions as a shrine and as proof the house remembers. Thilim still makes Seine's. Houses that became banks mostly stopped making them, except the one they will not let, which is how a clerk writes house custom on a slate and means a grave.

The romance of the empty bed is a Hands feeling. The name on the lintel is a Walking fact.

Roads that end at a Tree

The pilgrim-road was often the main road. A graft took beside it. The town grew around the canopy.

The road now ends at the Tree — the last holy mile is a square. Beyond the boughs the old way is a cart-track to timber, a neighbour, a ford. Children are told the road goes to the Motherwood. It goes to the mill. Both can be true if you keep walking, which most Hands-children do not.

A road that “ends” is a Clock 1 sentence. The necessity-family from the next valley is still using it as Clock 2. Same stones.

Other leftovers a character notices

- Empty Salt-Walk berths in Eolthael, except the expensive ones and the holds that smell of wet earth out of season.
- A Far-Voiced ridge-cry in an old pattern: the ford is wrong. No column answers. A Road-hand does. Birds do.
- A sibling-pair, one Given, one Kept, who will not walk the same side of a road — a split household’s grandchildren keeping a courtesy they cannot date.
- Markets that still swell at an old mile-mark in Hale-month, then vanish, even when no column comes. Habit is a leftover.
- A kitchen-knife on a ribbon in a Near-Mile house that will not name a saint (the nameless knife, still not a museum piece).

Deathless houses’ road-past as present credit

Many deathless houses began as road-houses. That fate-shift is already in the past: inns → banks, the same Long-Lived, a different fortune.

The founding-summer is the credit. “We kept you on the mile” is an origin-story that still collects. A century-loan written from a house-year is not only a dating-quirk. It is a claim that the porridge was real, the note was real, and the house is still the same mouth. No mortal court can audit a Long-Lived’s memory of a walk two hundred summers back. That is why the trusted note holds. It is also why a house can call a debt whose grandchildren do not remember the ford.

Two fates of the same origin, still standing.

- The White Note House — the reformation. Beds let to merchants. Paper on the quay. The 200th summer of the White Note is already a clerk’s problem. The Held names are in the founding-book. Most of those beds are let. One is not, which is how a bank proves it used to be an inn.
- The Third Hearth — the house that stayed a hearth. Thilim still keeps it, still makes Seine’s bed, still knows which mouths will be here at dark. The notes are smaller. The shrine is larger. Lestrاند calls this a bed-house that failed to become a bank. Thilim does not call it a failure.

The long-house of books is still the deathless paying their own Tithe. The road-past is why anyone trusted them to endow in the first place: a mouth that remembered every debtor on the mile is a mouth you let steer a library.

The prestige-walk is now a product some houses sell. A held-over winter at the origin — once the frightened far mercy — is a First-Hand year you can book. The White Note did not invent that. They noticed the upper room was empty in Nethael and full of the wrong people in Eolthael, and they made a term for it. Necessity-families still sign the old kind of note: eat now, pay on the home-walk, or when the child is grown, or when a sibling walks next year. Same paper, two jobs. The clerk who files both as occupancy cannot afford to see the difference.

Vaethorn will preach that the houses abandoned the waiting-road. History's job is shorter: the walk stopped being required in the core, the memory did not, the paper outlived the season. That is a reformation, not a betrayal, and it still collects. Spreading Trees did not make the notes kind.

Heskoren as the live front

This is Clock 2, present tense. Not a re-enactment of Brenvaeth. Some hamlets are in the Walking Years this year, for this cohort. Some are Hands-era one valley over. Both can be true on the same road.

Harrow's Green is the luckiest kind of Heskoren town: a scion that arrived in the C.Y. 200s, spoke a generation later, and has now Turned local children for a few generations. It is a neighbour's canopy. It is also a queue-confession you can see from the ford. The Harrow-sentence (we Turned at Harrow's Tree before we had our own) is how new towns talk everywhere. On Heskoren it is the decade.

The Three Hamlets Past the Ford are the waiting kind. The Seat's Cutting-leave already named them as thin soil. They send this year's ten-year-olds to Harrow's, or further if Harrow's year is too full, or still the Long Mile if the neighbour is a stick in a pot. They have learned not to say queue. They can see the canopy. Folk-right cutting is a temptation with a kitchen-knife. Most slips die. The ones that take are how the queue learns it is not the only horticulture in the world.

Old Ways host-rights start here as a collision, not a sermon. A graft in an old Taken-In green is a guest. A Cutting-leave is a mainland paper. The first meal comes first, or the planting is a claiming. The Door-Keepers and the Road-hands can both love the wood and still fight about the bowl.

Borrowed Turnings are the front's ordinary year. Citizenship-by-local-witness is Hands-era weather: the town that saw you may be Harrow's, not the hamlet that raised you. Vouching-at-a-distance — invented to carry an origin-fall home — now carries a neighbour-fall home. Same three pillars. Shorter road. The unvouched Struck are still older than the grafts. A local canopy did not dissolve them.

Seat narration: her will is still travelling. Folk memory: the cart came late, the soil was called thin, we can see Harrow's green from here. Vaethorn will preach we wait because we are unworthy. History does not agree. They wait because the wood is slow, the road is long, and the list was written in the Motherwood.

The Rain-Shadow on Maiethorn is the same grammar on an older continent: leftover waiting after the core stopped. Playable square: Ornsael. A west-road child after the Sacred Core has stopped walking is Clock 2 on the Motherland, which is how you know Ornthael is not a finished age.

What is strained

Not a chronicle of collapse. What a traveller can already see:

- The First Seat is old in the queue. It has authorized cuts for three hundred and eighty-seven summers. Towns that can see a neighbour's canopy have learned the horticulture-sentence by heart. Folk-right slips still happen. Threnmaieth still wants the college on the roll. The Seat is not falling. It is heavy.
- The Road-hands are thin on the Heskoren front. Living earth, mortal wood, a skeleton circuit, authority that expires a week out from the Motherwood. A live Tree is a quiet success no one writes down. A dead one is a name on a complaint. They plant what they were given leave to plant. They sleep in the town that was not chosen.
- Waiting towns hang on a single scion, or on a neighbour's week. That is a civic crisis wearing a child's summer.
- Deathless houses are richer in paper than in beds. The road-past is the credit. The upper room is the tell.

Play may later ask what gives. The pressure sits on the table.

Entity	State	Why the pressure is already visible
First Seat	Peak power, pressure rising	387 years of the queue; Threnmaieth proximity; folk-right cuttings that take; “thin soil” as a sentence towns can recite
Road-hands	Overextended at the Heskoren front	skeleton circuit; dead wood; authority that expires; blame when a pot dies; they sleep in the town not chosen
Waiting towns	Precarious	single scion or neighbour’s week; folk-right temptation; Kept-heavy / Struck-heavy as this year’s fact
Deathless houses	Peak, already reformed	road-past as un-auditable credit; concentration the rarity-cap fights; prestige-walk as product

A letting-slate from the White Note’s inland house

Kept by Mataero, who is junior to Ledan and has never made a Held bed. Cut-year 387; the house-year is not written on the recto. The verso is a copy of founding-names in an older hand.

Nethael closing. Upper room: twelve beds. Let: eight, to the wool out of Lestrand, term through Hale-month, pay on the quay-note. Open for Eolthael: four, First-Hand year, held-over child already spoken for, the mother paid the winter in advance. Occupancy will cover the loft.

Do not let the north bed. House custom. The founding-book has a name I am not to copy onto a term. Ledan says the house is the same mouth. I say the mouth is the note. The bed is empty. Empty is not a shrine. Empty is a bed we are not charging for.

Thilim’s third hearth still holds a far-cape name. We do not. We are not an inn that failed. We are the house that remembered long enough to be trusted.

I do not ask which summer was holy. I ask which mouths will pay in Ledger-month. If the north bed is a grave, it is a grave that does not belong on a letting-slate.

Mataero cannot afford to see that “house custom” is the credit, or that letting the loft to wool is how a road-house finishes becoming a bank in front of a junior who needs the conversion to be competence. The founding-name they will not copy is the Held bed as a bank-token. Thilim, inland, still making the bed, is the other fate of the same origin. Both houses are telling the truth they have. The wool will still come due.

Folklore of the road, the Cut, and the leftover

Three teaching-stories. The bones stay the same. The last line will not choose.

The Child Who Counted Stones

The teaching-story of the road. Told on the Walking Years' three walks, and still told in Hands-towns that have never sent a child as far as the next valley. Romance and graves in the same count.

A child asked how far it was to the Tree.

The mother said: as many days as there are stones.

The child walked, and counted. At each stone there was a ribbon, or there was not. The child asked if the ribbons were for people who had arrived.

The mother said: some.

They drank at the stones. They slept in their lee. They used them to know the water. The child kept count, and the count was the days, and the count was also the names the mother would not read aloud.

They arrived. A leaf fell, or the leaves hugged — the tellings do not agree, and it does not change the walk home.

On the way back the child asked to leave a ribbon.

The mother said: we are not a stone yet.

The child left one anyway, on a stone that already had too many, and could not say, later, whether they had been adding a day or a grave.

A Long-Lived who keeps a hearth on that mile will tell you the child's name. They will not tell you which summer. They still make a bed they will not let.

The last lines (by mouth). The bones above are common. What a mouth adds last is the stance:

- Near Mile (devout): The Mother had counted them first. The stones were how she kept the days.
- Near Mile (tired): It was a road. The stones were so you did not miss the water.
- Salt Walk: The sea has no stones. That is why we charge for the berth.
- Long Mile: The mother was wrong. There are more stones than days. That is how you know you are on the Long Mile.
- the Old Ways: The stones were there before the walk. The land was already counting.
- the Watching: The Tree saw every ribbon. The count was optional.
- Hands-era children: We climb them. There is a good one past the mill. The ribbon is just rag.

Skeptics of every walk tell a short ending: There were not two counts. There were people, and weather, and a grove that would not come to you.

Variants.

- On Maiethorn it is a walking-song; the chorus is only numbers.
- On Strandoren the quay-version starts at the berth and never finds a stone until the inland days, which is the joke and the bill.
- On Heskoren some tellers omit the arrival. The child is still counting when the story stops.
- A road-house telling ends on the Held bed, not the grove. Innkeepers think this is the real version.
- Kumbaen does not keep this story. A mainland guest who tells it is offered more supper, which is an answer.

The Branch That Came Away

The teaching-story of the Cut. Told about the First Cut, and still told in towns that have a Tree and a neighbour that does not. Sharing a Hand requires wounding a Hand, and the first copy invented both the local mercy and the wait.

A branch came away from the Tree.

A person carried it. They watered it. They put it in new ground.

It died.

They carried another. Or they carried the same one, and the tellings do not agree, and it does not change the ground.

It took.

The origin said: that wood is ours.

The new ground said: that wood is here.

Both were right, which is why there had to be a paper.

The paper said who may take the next branch. The Tree was not asked. The Tree kept choosing children under both canopies.

A child asked which Tree was the real one.

The mother said: count the Hands.

The child counted two, then twenty, then the towns that were not in the count yet.

The child asked who was next.

The mother said: the soil is thin there.

The child could see the neighbour's canopy from the ford, and could not say, later, whether they had been counting Hands or counting waits.

A Long-Lived who planted will tell you the child's name. They will not tell you which summer. They still will not write who cut.

The last lines (by mouth).

- Folk (Near Mile): The mother was the one who cut. The paper came after, like a fine.
- Clergy: The warden cut with a leave the college had not invented yet. The paper is how we kept the next one alive.
- Devout: The branch came away. No one stole a Hand. She gave one.
- the Watching: We have always cut living wood. They named one cut the First. The count is optional.
- the Old Ways: The ground received a guest. The paper is a mainland word for a meal they did not stay for.
- the Fair Hand: The second carrying was a berth. The first was an unlicensed one. That is the whole hymn.
- Hands-era children (a Tree-town): We Turn here. The neighbour walks. The story is why.
- Hands-era children (still walking): We can see the canopy. The story does not plant anything.

Skeptics of every house tell a short ending: There was not a Hand that learned to walk. There was wood, and a pot, and a college that got to the knife late.

Variants.

- On Maiethorn it is told at Turning-Week in the Motherwood and in kitchens that keep a knife on a ribbon. The Motherwood version starts at came away. The kitchen version starts at took.
- On Strandoren the quay-version never finds a Tree until the hold is opened. The joke is the bill. The bill is not a joke inland.
- On Heskoren some tellers omit the taking. The child is still asking who is next when the story stops. Guest-reading tellers start at the meal. First-reading tellers start at the claiming.
- A Seat telling ends on the paper, not the ford. Speakers think this is the real version.
- Kumbaan does not keep this story. A mainland guest who tells it is offered more supper, which is an answer.

The Child Who Climbed the Stone

The teaching-story of the leftover. Told in the Years of Hands about mile-shrines that outlived the requirement, and still told in towns that have a Tree in the square and a neighbour that walks. You cannot treat a stone as past without abandoning the people still using it as a mile, and you cannot treat the road as unchanged without lying about the local canopy.

A town grew a Tree beside the road.

The last stone of the old mile stood in what became the square. Children climbed it. A ribbon stayed on it, or did not — the tellings do not agree, and it does not change the scuff.

A warden said: it is in the way of the crowd.

A Long-Lived who keeps beds said: it is a name.

A child of the Tree-town asked how far it was to the Tree.

The mother said: we are already here.

A child from the hamlets past the ford came for a borrowed week, saw children on the stone, and asked how far it was to the Tree.

The Tree-town mother said: we are already here.

The waiting child said: we can see your canopy from the ford.

They climbed together. The waiting child left a ribbon. The Tree-town child could not say, later, whether they had been playing or counting a wait.

A Long-Lived who still makes a bed they will not let will tell you both children's names. They will not tell you which summer. They still will not move the stone, and they still will not say the road is over.

The last lines (by mouth).

- Tree-town (devout): The Mother stopped the road when the Hand arrived. The stone is how we remember the waiting.
- Tree-town (tired): The Tree is here. The stone is in the way. We climb it because it is the right height.
- Waiting child / Heskoren: We can see the canopy. The story does not plant anything.
- Lestrand: The beds upstairs are let. The stone is a mile-mark the clerks have not billed yet.
- Innkeeper: The stone is the upper room. We did not let it. That is the whole hymn.
- the Watching: The stone was already a stone. The Tree saw the climb. The count is optional.
- the Old Ways: The land was already counting. The square is a guest's furniture.
- Road-hand: I water at it. I sleep in the town that was not chosen. I do not say queue.

- Hands-era children (who have never walked): There is a good one in the square. The ribbon is just rag.

Skeptics of every house tell a short ending: There were not two roads. There was a stone, and a Tree, and a child who still had to walk.

Variants.

- On Maiethorn it is told as a square-game; the chorus is only already here. The Rain-Shadow telling (Ornsael) omits the Tree-town mother, or makes her wrong.
 - On Strandoren the quay-version starts in the loft and never finds a stone until inland, which is the joke and the bill.
 - On Heskoren some tellers omit the climb. The waiting child is still asking how far when the story stops. Guest-reading tellers start at the meal under the stone. First-reading tellers start at the claiming of the square.
 - A Seat telling ends on the crowd, not the ford. Speakers think this is the real version: the stone should move.
 - A White-Note telling ends on the north bed. Juniors think this is the real version: empty is not a shrine.
 - Kumbaan does not keep this story. A mainland guest who tells it is offered more supper, which is an answer.

Powers and Places

The fifteen

Fifteen named powers on the three large continents. Kumbaan is not a thirteenth mainland power and not a sixteenth: it is an isolate with a table, a moon, and a storm-wall. The Isle is a people at home; it is not a flag on the Seat's list.

Beneath the fifteen the world still swarms — marches, free towns, petty Tree-seats, un-polity'd wild. Fifteen names the powers worth naming, not the number of places that exist.

Continent	Reach	How many	Why that many
Maiethorn	full	6	old heart; a clutch of kingdoms competing for the grove and the inner sea
Strandoren	high	5	a constellation of coasts and compacts, not one market with a crown
Heskoren	thin	4	fewer, poorer, scattered; long wild between Trees
The Sundering Isle	near-none	0	not on this list

The name a polity gives itself reveals its stance. Root in the Old Tongue; pushed through the drift that matches theology and reach.

- Conservative (pious Maiethorn) — th and long vowels kept. The Mother-names cluster here: Threnmaieth counts her; Maiethvael gifts in her name and will not count.
- Worn (Heskoren) — th revered but softening; frontier coinage hesk- (not in the liturgy, because the liturgy is older than this grafting). Vaethorn keeps the holy sound on purpose. Ornled lets it go.
- Eroded (Strandoren) — th → t or dropped; ends clipped. Lestrand is still the most-drifted of the old three. Trenledd is what happens when thren itself wears down to a roll.

Pronunciation: CAPS = stress; ae = “ay”; th = thin.

Every polity sets three axes independently:

- Theology — how gift-devout is it? Ardent Motherfaith gift-integration at one end, frank secular pragmatism at the other.
- Reach — Tree-rich core or Tree-poor edge?
- Governance — how far does the state reach onto the person? From light guild self-rule (the warm default) all the way to a crown that writes its subjects down.

The fifteen at a glance

Axes: Theology (Motherfaith gift-devotion) · Reach · Governance. ● high · ◐ mid · ○ low.

Polity	Continent	T	R	G	One-line feel	Leftover it sits on
Threnmaieth	Maiethorn	●	●	●	the Mother's Reckoning; census as care	origin pilgrimage-towns under a roll — seat Maiethlir

Ornled	Heskoren	○	○	○	the Outer Ledger — secular frontier, no congregation-net	waiting cluster without a gospel

Polity	Continent	T	R	G	One-line feel	Leftover it sits on
Vaelhesk	Heskoren	◐ 	○	○	the Far Yield — Old Ways host-rights	guest-grove
Saelvaeth	Heskoren	◐	○	◐	the Sown Waiting — the live front as a march	live-front Tree-town

* Leddvael is low on Motherfaith and high on the Fair Hand — theology here still means gift-devotion; a rival faith filling the gap is not a fourth axis.  Vaelhesk is the same shape with the Old Ways.

Three corners left un-built in the archetype set sit on the map: Maiethvael (devout, rich, lightly governed), Trenledd (surveillance with no faith to sanctify it), Ornled (secular frontier, required on Heskoren).

No Kind-nations. Hearths, not flags. Saelthael is sand-country, not a Fox kingdom. Lirorn is a watershed, not a Tengu empire. Eolstrand and Netstrand are shores, not Selkie thalassocracies. Vaelhesk is host-rights, not a Taken-In nation.

No faith-nations. The Watching stays a heartland heresy inside Maiethorn districts, not a sixth Motherland flag. Leddvael is the one power that made a rival faith civic — and even there the Book-hands have no seat.

How they sit

Maiethorn — Threnmaieth coils near the sacred centre and wants everyone on the Threnhael; its seat is Maiethlir (thaw-river Hand, not the grove). Maiethvael is the old gift-country that shares the Mother and refuses the list: same hymns, opposite paper. Orenbren is the lodging-agglomeration of the Near Mile — civic, not clerical; the First Seat sits in the Motherwood beside it and is not its crown. Saelthael is the leeward east, still walking west after the core stopped. Eolstrand faces Strandoren across the inner sea. Lirorn holds the central range that divides the waters; Fox-of-the-Snows and Tengu hearths are densest here, and it is not their country.

Strandoren — Lestrand is the premier coast; its seat is Orentel (Salt Quay; White Note on the third quay, not the crown). Brenledd is the compact of towns that got tired of being priced by one set of houses. Leddvael made the Fair Hand a civic rite on a different stretch of signing-water. Trenledd is the wealthy interior that started counting tickets and did not stop. Netstrand faces the open ocean toward Heskoren and, in stories, the storm-wall.

Heskoren — Vaethorn is the waiting-gospel; its seat is Eolvaeth (pilgrim-edge, not Saelvaeth's march). Saelvaeth is the live edge of the wave (Harrow's Green sits in its orbit, not as a capital).

Vaelhesk keeps host-rights on old greens. Ornled is Vaethorn with the faith burned out instead of up — same thin Trees, no congregation to catch you. The Three Hamlets Past the Ford sit on the seam: they can see Harrow's canopy (Saelvaeth luck) and still hear Vaethorn guilt and Vaelhesk refusal (folk names Brenod · Vaelun · Ornath; the Seat still does not use them).

Two mouths, same fifteen

A Seat clerk and a Lestrand factor do not issue the same map. Orthopraxy is the peace; the list is the tell.

From a Cut-year minute, First Seat (C.Y. 387). Threnmaieth names itself the Reckoning and would name us. Maiethvael will not be named to them and still Sends the extra mile. Orenbren lodges what we do not house. Saelthael still walks, which the origin finds inconvenient. Eolstrand takes the inner sea. Lirorn takes the thaw. Across the water the factor's five: Lestrand, the Brenledd compact, Leddvael which files a Bound as a civic virtue, Trenledd which keeps a roll and will not call it a Threnhael, Netstrand which sells the west. On the far reach: Vaethorn waiting, Saelvaeth planting, Vaelhesk feeding a first meal we did not authorize, Ornled which will not say her name and will not keep a list either. Kumbaan is not a land we graft. We do not write it.*

From a house-year docket, a Lestrand factor. Price the inner-sea hinge (Eolstrand) and do not argue hymns with Maiethvael. Orenbren's beds are a market that calls itself a duty. Avoid Trenledd's roll unless you like being written. Leddvael will sign; that is cheaper than faith. Brenledd is many tickets. Netstrand quotes the far crossing like a pilgrimage. Heskoren: Vaethorn pays in blessing, Ornled in slate, Vaelhesk in a meal you had better eat, Saelvaeth in whatever the queue did this year. The Isle is a tale. We do not book it.*

Neither list is complete. Both are true of the speaker.

The three corners

Threnmaieth — the Tallied Crown

(THREN-my-eth · theology high · reach high · governance high — the darkest corner)

A pious, Tree-rich core kingdom that is also Watchful. Take the one aberrant crown that breaks the world's norm and keeps a census of persons and their Conditions, set it in the wealthiest, most devout, most Tree-dense land, and you get surveillance not as a nervous king's paranoia but as sanctified duty: the roster is kept because the Mother's gifts are precious and must be accounted for. The other two corners have injustices you can name and resent; this one dresses its injustice in the two things the world most trusts, faith and plenty.

Law. Alone among polities, the Tallied Crown keeps a record held on people — every subject and their gift written down, not as guild rolls or tax ledgers (everyone has those) but as a census of persons, framed at home as reverent stewardship of the Mother's blessings and experienced as exactly what it is: surveillance. Because reach is high, there is a great deal to count — dense Given, dense guilds, abundant Long-Lived whose memory the crown distrusts precisely because it isn't the crown's (the Tallied Crown's deepest tell: it will not rely on the three pillars the rest of the world runs on, because living memory answers to itself and a ledger answers to the crown). The unvouched are hunted and the Struck pursued to be catalogued; the Bound are watched far past their real hazard — pure stigma dressed as safety, since the Inviolable Will means the Whisper can't command and the roster's own clerks know it. Devotion supplies the justification the bare Watchful crown lacks: you would not hide a gift from the Mother, so why hide it from her stewards?

Economy. Tithe-need turned to leverage — and consecrated. The crown provides Tithe-upkeep efficiently, even generously (a pious, rich state can afford to), but holds what it provides: the green, the novelty, the outlets, the Stilled medicine, all furnished through channels the crown controls and can withhold. A population whose staying-whole runs through the state is a population that cannot afford to refuse it — the most complete control in the world, and here it wears a halo: to receive your Tithe-provision is to receive the Mother's bounty through her appointed hands, and to be cut off is framed as your lapse, not the crown's lever. Its deathless-house finance is superb and centuries-deep — but the Long-Lived here are courtiers and crown-archivists as much as bankers, their incorruptible memory bent to the census rather than free to check it.

Daily life. The sacrament and the census fused. A child's Turning is a joyous holy day that is also a state registration — the colour that falls is celebrated with a hymn and recorded by a clerk. Marriages of heritable Conditions (Two-Bodied bloodlines especially) are noticed, encouraged or discouraged, filed. The medicine that furnishes a Tithe is excellent and runs through the crown's channels. A household whose bloodline and upkeep are both on file is a household that cannot easily refuse the crown anything — domestic surveillance with a blessing said over it. The Kept are pitied here in the Warm's way and recorded in the Watchful's — passed over by the Mother, and noted as such.

Its injustice. The worst of both high axes, each excusing the other. The devotion sanctifies the surveillance (it is reverence to be counted), and the surveillance enforces the devotion (to refuse the count is impiety). There is no clean villain and no cackling tyrant — only a wealthy, faithful, orderly people who genuinely believe that accounting for the Mother's gifts is the highest form of tending them, and a machinery of control that this belief makes almost impossible to resist. It reads as chilling precisely because no other polity keeps such a list — the creepy record is this one crown's invention, and the faith is what lets it feel like grace.

The seat. Maiethlir (my-eth-LEER) — a thaw-river Hand in the Sacred Core. The extra mile is the leftover; the Threnhael is the layer. Does not own Thaeloren. The First Seat sits in the Motherwood beside.

Lestrand — the Ledger Coast

(leh-STRAND · theology low · reach high · governance low)

A dense, Tree-rich merchant power where the Trees are mature and many, the Given are dense, and the faith is worn lightly. Deep markets, thin welfare, and a cool, transactional read on the whole business of becoming. It shares the Waiting Lands' light-touch governance — no crown writes anyone down — but where the Lands' light state leaves a gap the faith fills, the Coast's light state leaves a space the guilds fill, completely.

Law. The world's warm default at its most developed: guild self-rule carried as far as it goes. The state is a charter-granting council of merchant houses and craft-guilds; it charters the Stilled's guild and the element-guilds and watches the guild, never the individual. Citizenship-by-witness runs smoothly here precisely because reach is high — abundant Long-Lived notaries, Bound whose sworn word closes every contract, Far-Voiced on every dock and in every court. The three pillars aren't reverence here; they're infrastructure, the machinery that lets a huge commercial city run on trust without a register. The Struck are vouched-in briskly and without much fuss — not graciously, just efficiently, because an unvouched person is a transaction that can't clear. The Inviolable Will is cited less as sacred bedrock than as sound commercial law: a Bound's contract binds property, not persons, and the Coast likes that line because it makes the Bound the perfect notary.

Economy. The richest corner, and the coolest. This is where deathless banking reaches full flower — deathless houses whose trusted notes are the nearest thing the world has to a gold standard, century instruments, the whole endow-not-inherit loop running at scale (the great endowed libraries and universities cluster here, funding the Long-Lived's own novelty-Tithe). Self-paying Conditions prosper — the Answered crafts, the Two-Bodied haulage and courier trades, the Stilled surgeons — because their labor is their upkeep and the market pays for the labor. Tithe-provision is a private market, not a public good: you buy your green, your novelty, your outlet, and if you can afford it you stay whole in comfort. Its injustice is the market's — the provided-for Tithe-poor get thin welfare in a rich city, the starkest have-and-have-not gap in the world, and the shadow economy (smuggled green, black-market novelty, sold vouching, off-book contracts feeding the Given-Over) runs biggest here because the legitimate market is biggest here. The concentration risk the deathless pose is at its most acute: a handful of houses that never die, quietly steering the wealthiest polity through patronage that never disperses.

Daily life. Superb Condition-medicine (the great Stilled infirmaries and deathless-endowed hospitals are here, in the rich core) — for those who can reach it; the queue outside it is longest here too. Family life shrugs at theology: a marriage market that reads Conditions as assets — a Two-Bodied bloodline is a trade dynasty, a Long-Lived match is a century of credit, and the aching Long-Lived marriage gets weighed coolly as a balance of grief against advantage. The Turning is a civic and commercial milestone more than a sacrament — a family's Leaf-Fall is watched for what guild the child's colour opens. Warm it is not; free and prosperous it very much is.

Its injustice. The coolest of the three. Nothing is policed — your marriage, your gift, your faith are your own — but everything is priced, and a person who cannot pay slides with a whole rich city stepping around them. The Coast will never file you or conscript you. It will simply let you fade if you run out of coin, and feel that it owed you nothing.

The seat. Orentel (or-EN-tel) — a salt-quay city on the inner sea. The White Note House sits on the third quay, north side, and is not the crown.

Vaethorn — the Waiting Lands

(vay-THORN · theology high · reach low · governance low)

A broad, thinly-peopled land at the world's Tree-poor margin, where the faith burns hottest precisely because the Trees are scarce — and where the ruling mood is waiting: for a graft to take, for a distant Tree to be reached, for a gift that may never fall. Where the Trees are few and young, more children come away Kept, more people are Struck later and alone, and the Motherfaith answers that scarcity not with less devotion but with more — pilgrimage, longing, and a theology built around waiting for a gift that may not come.

Law. Governance is almost absent — no crown reaches the individual, and custom outruns written law the way it does on any frontier. Citizenship is witnessed in the oldest, most literal way: a settlement small enough that everyone was there when you Turned. But the Lands' thin reach makes citizenship-by-witness fragile: with few Long-Lived to remember and few Bound to vouch, the three pillars that make proof-by-people work are stretched thin, and the unvouched Struck — a person who changed alone, with no guild to catch them and few witnesses to stand for them — is a constant, aching problem the Waiting Lands meet with faith rather than machinery. A feared Condition here is more likely to be met with a rope or a blessing than a licence, because there is no guild to issue one.

Economy. Little formal Tithe-infrastructure and few specialists — but the theology reframes the frontier's poverty as charity. Where a purely secular frontier improvises Tithe-provision as barter and favor, the Waiting Lands do it as alms and congregation: the venting a Far-Voiced needs happens at worship, the green a Taken-In needs is furnished by neighbours who count it a sacred duty, and the Taken-In whom rich cities keep at arm's length are here the honoured backbone of the land — working the living earth is the holy economy. It is commons-minded generosity with almost nothing to fund it: real warmth, real want, and a persistent thin edge where the provided-for Tithe-poor slide with only prayer for a net.

Daily life. Thin ceremony made enormous by devotion. A child's Turning at a small, hard-won grafted Tree is the event of a decade, held as a joyous, anxious sacrament — and the Kept child is felt most sharply here, because in a land starved of the gift, to be passed over reads (wrongly, and cruelly) as being passed over by the Mother herself. Medicine is a travelling stiller if the settlement is lucky and a rope-and-prayer if it is not; the core-vs-edge inequity is at its widest here. Families are warm, mixed, and self-reliant; a lapsing Condition with no infirmary to reach is a frontier tragedy the faith consoles but cannot cure.

Its injustice. Not a boot — a guilt. The scarcity of the gift becomes a theology of unworthiness: the Kept wonder what they lacked, the Struck wonder why the Mother came to them at the wrong door and alone, and a hard, quiet piety can shade into treating want as a spiritual failing. The Waiting Lands are the kindest place in the world to a whole neighbour and the loneliest to an unvouched one.

The seat. Eolvaeth (ay-ohl-VAYTH) — a pilgrim-edge vale behind the Strandoren-facing coast. People walk here to wait. The Tree is not a certainty. Not Harrow's Green, not the three hamlets, not Saelvaeth's march.

The twelve

The twelve stubs' capitals stay unnamed.

Maiethvael — the Gift-Realm

(my-ETH-vayl · maieth “Mother” + vael “gift” = “the Mother's Gift.”) Conservative drift: th kept. Theology high · reach high · governance low. Everyday Maiethvael; people Maiethvael-folk. Not Threnmaieth (the Mother's Reckoning).

An old, Tree-dense Motherland realm that treats Tithe-provision as public tending — greens, halls, and medicine furnished by congregation and guild, not by a crown channel. Citizenship is witnessed in the world's warm default. There is no Threnhael here; they will tell you counting persons is a failure of trust in the three pillars. The hymns are the same ones Threnmaieth sings. The paper is not.

Site. Full-reach Maiethorn country in sight of the pilgrimage weather, not coiled on the grove. Leftover: origin pilgrimage-country that furnishes — the extra mile as hospitality, not as a roll-line.

How it formed. Gift-integration that never accepted a census. When Threnmaieth began to write people down, Maiethrael kept the older proof: you belong because you were seen to Turn, and you stay whole because your neighbours tend what you were Given. Light state on purpose. The gap is filled by faith and guild, not by a clerk.

Structure. Guild self-rule under ardent practice. Recruits by office, faith, Condition-lean — not Kind. The Watching persists in old districts as it does elsewhere on Maiethorn; it is not a second flag.

Goals. Keep the gift hale without writing the gifted down. Furnish generously. Pity the Kept in a land where almost no child is Kept — the slight with no thin-Tree excuse.

Its injustice. Not a boot. A social tax of piety. Warmth is real and so is the bill: fall out of congregation and the net goes with it, and there is no crown to appeal to. The Kept here are pitied in plenty. Threnmaieth at least files them; Maiethrael loves them and cannot stop measuring what they missed.

Orenbren — the Witness-Hearths

(or-EN-bren · oren “to witness” + bren “hearth” = “the witnessing-hearth.”) Conservative drift. Theology high · reach high · governance mid-low. Everyday Orenbren; people Orenbren-folk. Does not own Thaeloren. Does not own the First Seat. The inns grew a country; they did not become one house.

The civic agglomeration of the Near Mile — lodging-squares, upper rooms, and old road-houses that stayed hearths when the walk stopped being required in the core. Pilgrims still come (the extra mile, the First-Hand year). Orenbren houses them. That is its power: not a crown on the grove, a monopoly on beds within a week’s walk of it.

The First Seat sits in the Motherwood beside this power and remains a college, not a throne. Threnmaieth would like the lodging-rolls. Orenbren witnesses who slept, not what colour they are.

Site. Maiethorn Sacred Core’s approach-country. Leftover: origin pilgrimage-town. Tree at the centre of each square; the road used to go further and now ends in a festival season.

How it formed. Walking-era hearths that federated around the one-week door. When Hands made the origin-walk optional, the beds did not empty — they changed jobs. Adaptive reuse at polity scale: a lodging-network that learned it could levy, charter, and speak as one without becoming clergy.

Structure. A compact of hearth-towns, not a single inn. Town-wardens and lodging-guilds. Recruits not by Kind. Deathless houses exist here as patrons of beds (the Third Hearth is the fleshed square of the type, not this power’s capital; neighbour Hands-town Brenthael).

Goals. Keep the extra mile possible. Charge for it in coin, duty, or hymn — the mix is the local argument. Refuse to be named as the Seat’s civic arm or Threnmaieth’s counted inn.

Its injustice. Hospitality as rent. Devotion priced as board. A pilgrim who cannot pay the First-Hand year still needs the hug; the upper room has learned what a bed is worth in Eolthael. Kindness with a slate.

Saelthael — the Sown Tree

(SAYL-thale · sael “sowing” + thael “Tree” = “the sown Tree.”) Conservative drift: th kept even in thin soil — they are still the Motherland. Theology high · reach mid-low (wells, not woods) · governance low. Everyday Saelthael; people Saelthael-folk. Shares sael with Saelvaeth on purpose — sowing on two continents, Clock 2 unfinished at the origin. Playable square: Ornsael. Not Ornsael’s kingdom; Ornsael is not this power’s capital. Not a Fox kingdom.

The Rain-Shadow: leeward east of the central range, dry hills and sand-country, towns at wells and at whatever graft will take. Full-reach continent, thinner wood. The core stopped walking. Saelthael did not. Children still go west in the neighbour’s week, or further, because a well-Tree is not a certainty.

Fox of the Sands hearths are densest here. That is terrain, not a flag. A town with no fox-born would be the thing worth asking about.

Site. Maiethorn’s dry east. Leftover: Rain-Shadow walk-hold. West-road after the core stopped. Proves Ornthael is unfinished even at the origin-continent. Fleshed square: Ornsael (the sown-ground, a well-town still walking west).

How it formed. Tree-seats that formed around wells and slow grafts (C.Y. 0–80 was slower here — dirt, not a different gospel). When origin-squares became Hands-country, sand-country kept the habit of going to a healthier canopy. The habit grew a polity: the people who still sow.

Structure. Light custom, town-wardens, wells as civic fact. Recruits not by Kind. The Taken-In honoured as they are on any thirsty land — backbone, not a nation.

Goals. Keep grafts alive in thin soil. Keep the west-road open. Refuse the core’s story that waiting here is a spiritual failing.

Its injustice. The motherland treats their waiting as a local soil-problem (true as far as it goes) and as a slight against the origin. Plenty next door; pilgrimage as a leftover they cannot retire. Vaethorn-guilt imported to sand that never asked for it.

Eolstrand — the Hinge-Shore

(AY-ohl-strand · eol “hinge” + strand “shore” = “the hinge-shore.”) Conservative drift: they kept the year-word on a coast-name. Theology mid · reach high · governance low. Everyday Eolstrand; people Eolstrand-folk or Hinge-folk. The inner sea is the hinge; the name says so. Not a Selkie nation.

Maiethorn's western ports on the busy inner sea toward Strandoren — the oldest trade route in the world, the “Old World” crossing. Ancient, rich, less frantic than the Ledger Coast. Faith worn thinner here than in Maiethvael because the docks teach pricing; Trees still healthy because this is still the Motherland.

Selkie families are common on these quays, as they are on any old water. That is a hearth, not a thalassocracy.

Site. Inner-sea face. Leftover: salt-adjacent Old-World quays (the Salt Walk's other shore — people embarked from Strandoren; they landed here).

How it formed. Port-kings and charter-harbours grown from the crossing. Conservative tongue because the grove is at their backs; mid theology because Lestrand is in front of them. A hinge has two sides.

Structure. Guild-coast, light state, old houses. Recruits not by Kind. Far-Voiced on every quay as infrastructure, same as Strandoren, with more hymn left in the voice.

Goals. Keep the inner sea the world's highway. Broker pilgrimage-traffic and cargo without becoming either Threnmaieth's counted port or Lestrand's priced one.

Its injustice. The pious shore that learned to let people fade from looking across the water. A Tithe-poor household fails in sight of the pilgrimage-road. Cool cousin, not a copy: they still say the blessing. They still step around you.

Lirorn — the Thaw-Land

(leer-ORN · lir “thaw; water that runs again” + orn “land” = “thaw-land.”) Conservative drift.

Theology mid · reach high · governance mid. Everyday Lirorn; people Lirorn-folk. The range divides Maiethorn's waters; the name is the snowmelt, not the Tree. Not a Tengu empire. Not a Fox-of-the-Snows kingdom.

Maiethorn's central range: high snow, rope-and-wing towns, rivers that begin as thaw. Reach is still full — grafts take in the valleys and the sheltered shelves — but the weather is bigger and the state is a watershed holding, not a cathedral square. Lowlands drink Lirorn's spring. Ridges notice.

Tengu ridge-towns and Fox-of-the-Snows hearths sit densest here. Mixed Kinds on every shelf. A lowlander arriving on foot is a guest who climbed.

Site. The range that divides the continent's watersheds. Leftover: ridge-roads that used to be walking-paths to the grove; stones in high squares; some roads that now end at a local Tree.

How it formed. March-holds on the snowmelt. Mid governance because water is a fact you can levy without a census of souls: you tax the thaw, the pass, the high road. Theology cooled by height and distance from the grove's daily pressure, not by doubt.

Structure. Ridge-compacts, pass-tolls, valley charters under a holding. Recruits not by Kind. Sky-couriers as ordinary office, not a racial guild.

Goals. Keep the passes and the spring. Be paid for water the core calls a gift. Stay un-named to the Threnhael as a people — they will name the passes if they can.

Its injustice. The ridge pays in isolation for water the valley drinks. Tolls that feel like geography. A shelf-town whose graft sickens is a long way from a stiller. Mid-state enough to levy; not enough to furnish every Tithe on a cliff.

Brenledd — the Hearth-League

(bren-LED · bren “hearth” + ledd “to reckon” = “hearths of the ledger.”) Eroded drift: no th to keep. Theology low · reach high · governance low. Everyday the Brenledd or the compact; people Brenled-folk. A league, not a capital.

A league of charter-towns on Strandoren — river-ports, lesser harbours, inland markets — that compact to face Lestrand's houses without becoming one house. Each town is a hearth with its own Tree and its own vouching. The compact is the arithmetic: shared tickets, shared notes, shared refusal to be priced one at a time.

Faith worn light, same as the coast. Trees mature. Nothing is policed; everything is chartered.

Site. The constellation behind and between the premier coast. Leftover: salt and river towns; some road-end Tree-towns that federated instead of fading into a deathless house's hinterland.

How it formed. Towns that got tired of being the other party on a Lestrand note. Network emergence, not a founding king; the compact is a pile of charters that learned to speak together. Layered, ugly, and alive.

Structure. A council of hearths. You are of your town first. Recruits not by Kind. A person vouched in one Brenled square may still be a stranger in the next — the compact moves coin better than it moves standing.

Goals. Keep many tickets cheaper than one house. Underwrite each other. Stay a league when Lestrand would rather negotiate with a single throat.

Its injustice. Falling between charters. Vouched here, unknown there; Tithe-provision a town matter the compact will not touch. Thin welfare in a rich network. The fade happens in the gaps the league calls local.

Leddvael — the Reckoned Gift

(led-VAYL · ledd “to reckon” + vael “gift” = “the gift reckoned.”) Eroded drift. Motherfaith theology low; the Fair Hand worn as civic law. Reach high · governance mid. Everyday Leddvael; people Leddvael-folk. The name is the doctrine: a gift is a bargain priced. The Book-Hands stamp and recite; they have no seat and do not rewrite Bound Terms.

A signing-coast on Strandoren that took the Fair Hand from a dockside theology to a civic rite. Leaf-Fall is a festival and a signing-watch. Tithe is a term serviced. The Bound are model citizens here — not feared, employed as the shape of honesty. Mid governance: the book is a kind of statute without quite becoming a census of souls. They will not copy Threnmaieth’s list. They will file a contract.

Site. A different stretch of indented coast than Lestrand — enough water to have its own houses. Leftover: salt quay with a signing-watch. Empty Eolthael berths; holds that smell of earth; Fair Hand clerks in the same wind as Motherfaith tree-tenders.

How it formed. Fortune-and-contract practice thickening until a charter-coast found it cheaper to establish the Settling than to argue hymns per dock. Not a prophet-kingdom. A habit that got a seal.

Structure. Charter-council plus book-tables. Recruits not by Kind. Gift-reading families live here; they are the minority that sounds devout and looks like a credit risk.

Goals. Keep signings clear. Vouch the Struck briskly as a later contract. Treat Motherfaith gift-talk as unpriced language — allowed, not preferred.

Its injustice. Bargain-theology as statute. A Given child is a term opened. A household that insists the colour was a gift is a bad debtor in a signing-town. The Bound are safe and over-read — the world’s contract-pillar asked to be the world’s whole person. No villain-faith; a sincere ledger laid over real Conditions.

Trenledd — the Worn Count

(tren-LED · eroded thren “sacred counting” + ledd “to reckon.”) The liturgical reconstruction Threnledd is unused on purpose: they will not say the holy word. Theology low · reach high · governance high. Everyday Trenledd or the Trenled; people Trenled-folk. They call the list the roll — Lestrand’s word for a tax roll, here meaning persons. The erosion is the thesis.

Wealthy Strandoren interior: mature Trees, dense Given, guilds thick — and a state that writes people down. The list began as ticket-and-tax machinery (safety-licences, house-notes, charter-rolls) and forgot to stop at property. There is no hymn that makes it stewardship. There is no Mother to be accounted to. You are on the roll because commerce and hazard-control wanted a name they could find again.

Threnmaieth at least claims to keep you hale. Trenledd claims to keep you findable. Cutting you off is default, not impiety.

Site. Tree-rich interior (not the deep thin interior — reach is high). Leftover: road-end Tree-towns that got filed; stones in squares with numbers on the back.

How it formed. Guild-tickets plus deathless memory plus a council that distrusted living witness the way Threnmaieth does, without Threnmaieth's scripture. The three pillars work here and are treated as insufficient — feeling, word, and memory answer to themselves. A ledger answers to the desk. Evolutionary, not a coup: each crisis added a column.

Structure. A writing-crown or writing-council. Licence-guilds as state organs. Recruits not by Kind. The Struck are pursued to be catalogued because an unwitnessed change is a row that appeared without a clerk.

Goals. Know who is dangerous, who owes, who Turned. Furnish Tithe through channels that can be shut. Do not argue theology; argue procedure.

Its injustice. A census with the halo worn off. You cannot appeal to piety. You cannot shame them with “the Mother's gifts should not be listed” — they agree, and list you anyway, as cargo and hazard. Colder than the Tallied Crown. The ~5%-scary dial's bureaucratic edge.

Netstrand — the Night Shore

(NET-strand · eroded neth “night; the long dark” + strand “shore.”) Reconstruction Nethstrand unused in daily speech. Theology mid-low · reach high · governance low. Everyday Netstrand; people Netstrand-folk. Why night sits on this shore is not fully explained — west water, storm stories, watches they keep after dark. Leave it.

Strandoren's west and south face: open ocean toward Heskoren and, far beyond, the storm-wall. Bold houses run the frontier trade. The Salt Walk's prestige-berths live here as a product — the First-Hand year sold to inland coin. Almost none have crossed to the Sundering Isle; those who claim to are the tellers of Yumboe stories.

Faith mixed: Motherfaith worn light, Fair Hand ordinary on a signing-quay, quay-charms nobody writes down. Trees still mature along this wealthy edge.

Site. Open-ocean coast. Leftover: salt quay; empty Eolthael berths; earth-smelling holds (graft-pots going out); the neighbour's week billed as a crossing.

How it formed. West-houses grown from Salt Walk traffic and the later carrying to Heskoren (by sea, coasts first, then the far). A shore that faces the wave's supply-line, not the grove.

Structure. Merchant houses, berth-guilds, light charter-council. Recruits not by Kind. Selkie common, not a flag. Sky-couriers from Lirorn and Tengu families on clock-towers — jobs, not a district.

Goals. Quote the far crossing. Keep the Heskoren run profitable. Sell Isle-tales without having to survive them. Do not let Trenledd write the berths.

Its injustice. The walk as inventory. Prestige priced; necessity billed; a neighbour's week to a waiting cluster is a line on a docket. Kindness for those who can book.

Ornled — the Outer Ledger

(orn-LED · orn “land” + ledd “to reckon”; clipped from Ornledd.) Worn-to-eroded on purpose: on Heskoren, dropping the sacred sound is a neglect, not just distance. Theology low · reach low · governance low. Everyday Ornled; people Ornled-folk. Reconstruction Ornledd unused — they do not tend old endings. A Vaethorn without the faith, harder and colder. Neither lawless-brutal nor noble-savage-pristine.

Thin-reach Heskoren country that never took the waiting-gospel. Same young grafts, same Kept-heavy and Struck-heavy weather as Vaethorn — and no congregation to fill the gap. Tithe-provision is barter, favor, and a slate on the wall. An unvouched Struck is a problem met with a rope, a deal, or a neighbour, not a blessing. Custom outruns law because there is almost no law and almost no hymn.

They do not hate the Mother. They do not use her. Vaethorn hears the missing th in their name as godlessness. Ornled hears Vaethorn's th as a luxury.

Site. Frontier pockets off the hottest pilgrim-roads. Leftover: waiting cluster without a gospel. Same stones, same upper rooms if a walk used to pass; the leftover job is necessity, not devotion.

How it formed. Kept/Struck-heavy districts that watched the waiting-theology arrive with the grafts and declined to make scarcity a soul-problem. Improvisation as culture. Low governance because no one has the spare people to be a state. The Fair Hand is a rumour from ships, not a civic rite — they have few Bound to make a book of.

Structure. Town custom, slates, vouching stretched thin. Recruits not by Kind. The Intake's problem is acute here and unofficial: a raw Struck, a shed if you're lucky, silence if it works.

Goals. Stay whole with what is in the pot. Do not owe a hymn for green. Trade with Netstrand when a ship comes; do not become its billed neighbour.

Its injustice. No net. Vaethorn's cruelty is guilt; Ornled's is absence. A person who cannot barter their Tithe slides with no prayer and no guild. The loneliest unvouched in the world are not in the waiting-lands. They are next door, where no one is waiting with them.

Vaelhesk — the Far Yield

(VAYL-hesk · vael in the older sense, “what the land yields” + hesk- “far/outer edge” = “the far yield.”) Worn frontier coinage; vael kept because the Old Ways claim the Motherfaith narrowed it to “gift.” Theology mid as Motherfaith gift-devotion, high as Old Ways practice. Reach low · governance low. Everyday Vaelhesk; people Vaelhesk-folk or the Yield. The fight with Vaethorn is in the first syllable: vael vs vaeth. The land is the seat. Not a Taken-In nation.

Pre-graft host-lands on Heskoren: old greens, ancestor-doors, first meals. The Mother’s wood is a guest. A Cutting-leave without the meal is a claiming. The Door-Keepers walk here as Kin-speakers; the land is the seat, not a college.

Struck and the Taken-In are read as the land’s own children. A neighbour’s week to a Motherfaith Tree can be refused on purpose — the child is already the hill’s. Vaethorn reads those children as Kept-for-want. Both families are telling the truth they have.

Site. Heskoren’s old greens, not only the live front. Leftover: guest-grove. The Door-Keepers walk here. This is host-rights, not a second Harrow.

How it formed. Animist/ancestor polities that predate the wave. When grafts arrived (C.Y. 200–387, still arriving), some districts became Vaethorn. These kept the door. Low state because the land does not need a clerk to be owed a meal.

Structure. Hearth-clusters, door-keepers, host-right custom. Recruits not by Kind. Taken-In densest as frontier labor and as kin, still not a flag.

Goals. Feed the first meal. Name a Struck at the door that made them. Treat a warden with a pot as a guest or as a thief, depending on whether they sat down.

Its injustice. Host-rights as a claim that can shun. Refuse the meal, take the wood, and you are not a neighbour. A Road-hand on a clock can become a trespasser for following a Seat sentence. Kindness with a threshold. The injustice is local and real; it is not holy war.

Saelvaeth — the Sown Waiting

(sayl-VAYTH · sael “sowing” + vaeth “the waiting” = “sowing into the waiting.”) Worn drift: th kept — they still reach for the holy words because the wave is here. Theology mid-high · reach low · governance mid-low. Everyday Saelvaeth; people Saelvaeth-folk. Shares sael with Saelthael on purpose: planting on two continents. Playable squares in orbit: Harrow’s Green · the Three Hamlets Past the Ford. Still not a capital. Eolvaeth is Vaethorn’s seat, not this march’s. Harrow’s Green sits in its orbit, not as a capital.

The live front of Clock 2 on Heskoren: C.Y. 200–387, still incomplete. Towns form where a graft has taken; between them, waiting clusters who can see a neighbour’s canopy. Harrow’s Green is the luckiest kind of square in this march — a Hand that grew up (not this power’s capital). The Three Hamlets Past the Ford can see that green and were written as remainder (folk names Brenod · Vaelun · Ornath; the Seat still does not use them). The queue is visible. It is not a metaphor. Pair with Ornsael on Saelthael: same sowing, origin-continent leftover.

Governance is mid-low because someone must stand for the Harrow-sentence: wardens, Road-hands passing through, a march-voice that did not exist when the first pots came. Not a tall state. Enough state to be blamed.

Site. Heskoren’s grafted pockets on the moving edge. Leftover: live-front Tree-town. Necessity’s neighbour’s week.

How it formed. The wave, this decade. Paying-enough, soil-enough, chain-enough nexts on a list written in the Motherwood. A polity made of luck-plus-queue. Vaethorn will preach unworthiness. History does not agree.

Structure. Town-wardens, borrowed Turnings, Road-hands who sleep here on the way to a town that was not chosen. Recruits not by Kind. The Old Ways are neighbours (Vaelhesk), not a museum. Vaethorn heat sits on many hearths as gospel, not always as flag.

Goals. Keep taken grafts alive. Host the neighbour’s week. Argue the next pot. Survive being the sentence the Seat already wrote.

Its injustice. The queue as a border. Harrow’s luck is politics. The hamlets can see the canopy and send children anyway. Folk-right temptation in a kitchen drawer. Spreading Trees did not make the march kind.

Gazetteer types

Every Turning-place already inherits: the Tree at the centre (or the neighbour’s Tree, or the wait for one); Tithe-provision as civic utility where the polity can afford it; dangerous trades on the edges; homes that accommodate becomings; the reach-edge writing the map.

Layered on top from the Years of Hands: a road that used to go further; a stone that used to be a day’s walk; an upper room that used to be a pilgrim-dorm; a house that used to be an inn. Adaptive reuse is how Ornthael looks like a present.

Kumbaan is not in this catalog. The Isle’s places wait on a later pass with the Open Table, not with mile-shrines.

One leftover job per street, not all of them — devotion, prestige, and necessity can share an inn; they should not all be the town's theme.

Type	What it is	Layered leftover	Where it lives	Named square or seat
Origin pilgrimage-town	devotion's extra mile; the Motherwood's lodging	Near Mile as civic season and holiday; Seat proximity	Maiethorn Sacred Core	Maiethlir (roll layers the leftover; does not own the grove) · neighbour square: Brenthael
Road-end Tree-town	the walk stopped here; the square is the last mile	stone in the square; road ends at the boughs; upper room	any Hands land; densest on Maiethorn	unused as a lead; layered onto Harrow's / Brenthael
Deathless inn-bank	road-past as credit	beds + notes; Held bed as house custom	Near Mile inland; Salt-Walk quay	the Third Hearth (stayed a hearth) · the White Note House on Orentel (desk, not the crown)
Salt quay	prestige-walk + pots	empty Eolthael berths; holds that smell of earth; Fair Hand signing-watch	Strandoren coasts	Orentel (White Note on the third quay, not the crown)
Live-front Tree-town	luckiest Heskoren; neighbour's canopy	Harrow-sentence as this decade ; borrowed Turnings inbound	Heskoren	Harrow's Green
Waiting cluster	queue made visible; Clock 2 this year	can see a neighbour's canopy; folk-right temptation; Kept/Struck-heavy	Heskoren; also Rain-Shadow pockets	the Three Hamlets Past the Ford (folk names Brenod · Vaelun · Ornath)
Sick-Tree square	Hands that un-Hands	necessity-walk returns ; civic crisis wearing a child's summer	any continent the wood has reached	unused as a named square; well-graft weather lives on Ornsael without a named sick fall
Guest-grove	Old Ways planting	first meal vs Cutting-leave; host-rights	Heskoren old greens	the Door-Keepers at Vaelun; host-rights, not a second Harrow

Type	What it is	Layered leftover	Where it lives	Named square or seat
Rain-Shadow walk-hold	leftover waiting on the Motherland	west-road after the core stopped	Maiethorn dry hills	Ornsael (proves Ornthael is unfinished even at the origin-continent)
Pilgrim-edge	wait as destination	congregation made a country; Tree not a certainty	Heskoren	Eolvaeth

Three leftover types remain available as gazetteer kinds, not yet seated as named squares:

- Sick-Tree square — a Hands-town whose Tree has sickened or failed a fall, putting the town back on the neighbour's week. Clock 1 flipping, not an age ending. Civic crisis wearing a child's summer.
- Guest-grove — an old green where a graft is a guest. First meal before anyone's leave; host-rights. Old Ways planting. Play with the Door-Keepers.
- Road-end Tree-town (as a lead type) — the walk stopped here; the square is the last mile. Stone in the square; road ends at the boughs; upper room. Layered onto Harrow's and Brenthael already; unused as a named lead of its own.

Playable squares

Harrow's Green

A live-front Tree-town. The luckiest kind of Heskoren square: a scion that arrived in the C.Y. 200s, spoke a generation later, and has now Turned local children for a few generations. The neighbour's canopy. The Harrow-sentence — we Turned at Harrow's Tree before we had our own — is how new towns talk everywhere; here it is the decade. Everyday Harrow's green was already a Seat sentence (Cutting-leave). Warden: Haelin (HAY-lin). A small town — a few hundred hearths around one canopy. Not a capital of Saelvaeth.

A grafted pocket on the Sundered Reach. Settlement clustered where the wood took. Harrow's is old enough, for the front, to be a town: a canopy at the centre, a square that used to be a road, borrowed Turnings inbound from the Three Hamlets Past the Ford every Eolthael.

It is not the end of the wave. It is a Hand that grew up. The three hamlets can see the green from the ford. The Seat has already written that the wood will take here and not, this year, there. Harrow's lives inside that sentence whether it asked to or not.

Vaethorn heat sits on many hearths as gospel, not always as flag — this square lives in Saelvaeth's orbit (the live-front march), not as its capital. The Old Ways are neighbours, not a museum. A first meal at a later planting is a live argument, not a courtesy-card.

Leftover job on this street: necessity — the neighbour's week. Devotion leaves a ribbon on the stone. Prestige does not book a winter here.

Site. A low rise above a stream that becomes the ford downstream. The graft took on the rise; the old pilgrim-road climbed it because that was the day's water. Towns on Heskoren do not pick a pretty hill and then invent a Tree. The wood picked, and the hearths followed.

Water is the stream, a cistern by the warden-hearth, and the stone in the square — still the day's drink for anyone using the road as a mile. Food is the pocket's gardens, ranging beyond the last house, and whatever the neighbour's week brings in Hale-month (mouths, dust, a complaint). Fuel is the same woods the Two-Bodied use as ranging; the Taken-In keep the greens around the Tree from going to seed indoors. There is no resident stiller. A travelling one is a summer's luck.

The square is the last holy mile. Beyond the boughs the old way is a cart-track to the ford. Children are told the road goes to the Motherwood. It goes to the mill, and then to three hamlets that can see the canopy. Both are true if you keep walking.

The square — nucleated around the canopy. Organic, not a grid — the oldest lintels face the Tree; later houses filled the wedge between the road and the stream. No walls. The boundary is the ranging and the last garden.

- The Tree at the centre — mature enough to Turn; young enough that grandparents remember the borrowed years. Leaf-Fall is held in the square because there is nowhere else a crowd fits. The town's age can be read in the wood: a Hand, not a First.
- The stone — last mile-shrine of the road that used to go further. Climbing-scuff. Water the Road-hands still use. Ribbons some years. Haelin, town-warden, wants it moved before the next Leaf-Fall because it is in the way of the crowd. Thilim, if asked, would say it is a name. A hamlet child will climb it and ask how far it is to the Tree.
- The upper room — still too many beds for the present trade. Opens for the neighbour's week; not yet a merchant-loft. A Road-hand sleeps here on the way to a town that was not chosen, sometimes with a pot. Hale-month is dust and extra mouths. Ledger-month is local.
- The greens — potted groves and a garden-common around the Tree, enough, not a lot with a ticket. They will not follow you home. The Taken-In here are neighbours, not a quarter.

- The ranging — at the town edge, not a beast-yard. Two-Bodied work the woods that feed the hearth. No Kind-flag on the trees.
- The far shed — Returned plague-and-body work, downwind, the same logic as a tannery. Not an infirmary. Not a district.

Homes accommodate becomings: a window that opens, a room kept green, a threshold a Long-Lived waits to be asked across. Mixed Kinds. A Fox of the Wilds at the ranging is unremarkable. A Tengu on a ridge-visit is a guest.

Tithe-provision is frontier-warm and thin: the greens, the ranging, the upper room as a seasonal outlet for whoever is loud that week. No counted hall. No stiller on a licence-wall. You can be too poor to stay whole here, and the neighbour's week will not fix that.

Clock 1: the square is the last mile; the road ends at the boughs; Hands-children Turn at home.

Clock 2: the hamlets can see the canopy; they send this year's ten-year-olds; a Road-hand is going the other way with wood. The Harrow-sentence is this decade, not nostalgia.

A warden who pulls the stone down is doing theology with a hammer. They are not wrong that Leaf-Fall needs the space. They are wrong if they think the graves went with the requirement. The next necessity-column will miss the water. Haelin knows this and still wants it moved. That is the tension, not a villain.

Offices. Town-warden (Haelin) — practice-first, not Kind. Speaks the fall truly enough for a front-town. Believer-heavy the way a live Tree makes you; still has to lodge the neighbour's week. The scion-queue is not theirs to fix and is the sentence they live in. The square that watches children Turn — Harrow's witness is what a hamlet child carries home. Vouching-at-a-distance was invented for an origin-fall; here it is a walk back to the ford. Road-hands passing through — they sleep in the town that was chosen, on the way to the one that was not. A Door-Keeper at a later planting — host-rights if a cut from Harrow's is set in an old green. The first meal, or a claiming. Saelvaeth's march-voice can be blamed when the queue is ugly. It does not sit a throne here.

A notice chalked on the cistern-wall, Hale-month, C.Y. 387. Haelin's hand. The stone is not named.

The crowd will need the square. The stone will be walked around until Eolthael, and then we will see. Water stays. Names stay if they were names. Climbing is for after.

Beds above: the neighbour's week first. A pot is not a pilgrim. A pilgrim is not a pot. I can tell. I will not always say.

If you came from the ford, you are seen here. If you must be seen at home, take a mouth with you that was here. I will not walk it for you. I have a Tree.

Haelin cannot afford to see that “I have a Tree” is the luck the Seat already wrote, or that moving the stone is the Harrow-sentence said with a hammer. The hamlets will hear the notice as a slight even if it is only a crowd. Both are telling the truth they have.

The Three Hamlets Past the Ford

A waiting cluster. The Seat’s Cutting-leave already filed them as a remainder: the wood will take at Harrow’s green. It will not take this year at the three hamlets past the ford — the soil is thin there. They can see Harrow’s Green from the water. They send this year’s ten-year-olds to the neighbour’s week, or further if Harrow’s year is too full, or still the Long Mile if the neighbour is a stick in a pot. Folk hearth-names; the Seat still does not use them. That blindness is load-bearing. Three hearths — a few dozen houses each, not a town. Not one village.

Three hearths past a ford on Heskoren, close enough to share a complaint and far enough that a scion for “the hamlets” would still be a fight about which green. Thin reach as weather: Kept-heavy and Struck-heavy this year, for this cohort. Not a re-enactment of the Walking Years. Clock 2, present tense.

They have learned not to say queue. They can recite the horticulture-sentence. Folk-right cutting is a kitchen-knife in a drawer, not a rebellion with a flag. Most slips die. The ones that take are how the First Seat learns it does not own the Tree’s tissue, only the authorization.

Old Ways hearths among them may refuse the neighbour’s week on purpose. Their children are already the land’s. Motherfaith neighbours read those children as Kept-for-want. Both families are telling the truth they have. History does not agree with Vaethorn guilt.

Geographically they sit on a seam: Saelvaeth luck they can see, Vaelhesk refusal in the kitchen, Vaethorn gospel on the tongue, Ornled slate if they walk the other way.

Leftover job on this street: necessity. They are making the week. Devotion is a misreading visitors bring. Prestige does not stop at the ford.

Site. The ford is the Seat’s geography — the thing you can see Harrow’s green from, water a mile-shrine would have marked if anyone had set a stone on the waiting side. No stone. That absence is a leftover. Necessity still drinks there. Children still ask how far it is.

The stream comes down from Harrow’s rise. In clear weather the canopy is a dark against the far slope. In rain it is a rumour you have to take on trust. The three greens sit on slightly different ground: a wetter shelf, an old taken plot, a thinner rise past the last hedge. A scion planted “for the hamlets” would still be a fight about which of those is soil.

Food is gardens, a shared mill-path, ranging that is just the woods. No venting-hall. No lot. Tithe-provision is the yard and the neighbour. A lapsing Condition here is a family problem before it is a guild's.

Dispersed, not nucleated. You walk from hearth to hearth. You do not walk through a town. The cluster is a complaint with three kitchens.

Brenod (BREN-od)

The sending hearth. Motherfaith as practice: they walk the child to Harrow's, they want a mouth that was there to walk back and stand for the fall, they can recite the thin-soil sentence without using the word queue. The kitchen-knife is in this drawer more often than the others, which does not mean they have used it. It means they have looked at it.

Brenod's leftover is the neighbour's week as duty. A visitor from the core will hear faith. Brenod hears a date in Eolthael.

Vaelun (VAY-lun)

The yield-hearth. Older vael — what the land keeps — not vaeth, the waiting. The Old Ways sit this kitchen. They may refuse the neighbour's week on purpose. Their children are already the land's. A first meal is not a courtesy-card; a later cut from Harrow's, acting on the origin's behalf, still wants the bowl if this ground is an old green.

Vaelun's leftover is host-rights, not a second Harrow. The Door-Keepers play here. Motherfaith neighbours in Brenod will call Vaelun's Kept children passed-over. Vaelun will not correct them in the Mother's language.

Ornath (OR-nath)

The furthest past the ford. Thinnest soil as a feeling, not a decided horticulture. Ornath can see Harrow's when the weather is kind and can walk the other way, toward Ornled's slate, if the congregation-net fails. They have not gone. The road is still a temptation that looks like sense: no gospel, a ledger, the same thin Trees.

Ornath's leftover is the wait with an exit that is not a Tree. Some mouths there still wait. Some have stopped saying her name and have not started keeping a list either.

Which green has the sick stick is not decided. A pot in a yard, a young failure, or nothing yet — any of the three can hold it for a night. The fight about which green would receive a scion is the cluster's civic life. Naming the hearths did not end that fight. It gave it doors.

Clock 1: Harrow's has a Tree. The square down the slope is Hands.

Clock 2: this year's ten-year-olds still walk. Kept-heavy and Struck-heavy as weather, not as a closed age. A split household, shorter: one child to Harrow's, one Kept at the ford, a sibling who will not walk the same side of the road.

There is no stone on the waiting side. There is a cup. The night before the neighbour's week someone leaves it on the ford-rock. If it fills, they send. If it does not — the tellings do not agree, and the child still goes, or does not, according to the kitchen, not the cup. The cup is not explained. Brenod calls it weather. Vaelun calls it the land answering. Ornath has started leaving it empty on purpose, or has not.

What must exist: families who walk one child and not another (the split household, shorter); a person who will vouch a neighbour-fall all the way home — Harrow's witness walking back to the ford (if they will not, the child is seen at Harrow's and unvouched at breakfast); a Kin-speaker who will stand for a Struck the square will not; someone who owns a knife they will not call nameless; a Door-Keeper's cousin in Vaelun who will ask about the bowl before they ask about a leave.

The Seat's leave still says the three hamlets past the ford. Clerks who learn Brenod, Vaelun, Ornath have learned more than the minute wanted them to.

Said at the ford, not written. A Brenod mouth, a Vaelun mouth, an Ornath mouth. Same water.

We can see it. That is not the same as having it.

The land had them before the cart came. I will not walk a child to a neighbour to be named a Waited.

If the cup stays dry I still have to decide. The slate the other way does not ask about soil.

None of the three can afford to hear the other two as the whole truth. The canopy does not care. The leave already named them without naming them.

The Third Hearth (and Brenthael)

A road-house that stayed a hearth. The third lodging out from the Motherwood on the Near Mile, kept by Thilim (THIL-im) — Long-Lived, inland, keeping this house since before the First Cut, as later clerks would say. Seine's bed is still made. The notes are smaller than the White Note's. The shrine is larger. Everyday the third hearth; cant brenhael like any road-house. Neighbour-town Brenthael (bren-THALE) — bren + thael, "the hearth-Tree." On Maiethorn, in Orenbren's lodging-country. Not Orenbren's capital. Does not capture the First Seat.

An old Near-Mile house, three days' walk out from Thaeloren toward the approach-country. Beds, porridge, a dry room, a green-lot, a shed. In Brenvaeth it sold the walk you could not miss twice. In Ornthael it still opens for Eolthael.

It sits in Orenbren's lodging-country — civic beds within a week's walk of the grove — and is a seed of that type, not the compact's throne. The inns grew a country. This is one mouth.

Leftover job on this street: devotion — the extra mile as civic season. The loft still sleeps necessity and, rarely, prestige; Thilim can tell who is which. They will not always tell you. The White Note sells the First-Hand year. This house makes the bed.

Lestrand calls this a bed-house that failed to become a bank. Thilim asks which mouths will be here at dark. Both are telling the truth they have.

Site. The Near Mile is a week's door to the origin. Counted from the grove outward: first hearth a day out, second, third. Pilgrims walking in hit the neighbour-town first.

Brenthael stands a day's walk further from the grove than the inn — a Hands-town that grew around a graft planted beside the road. The pilgrim-way now ends at Brenthael's Tree. Beyond the boughs: mill, timber, the rest of Maiethorn. Children there are told the road goes to the Motherwood. It does, if they keep walking past the inn, two more hearths, and the wood. Most Hands-children do not.

The Third Hearth kept the older job: beds for people still going in. Water is a well in the yard and the stone at the lintel-road — a day's-walk shrine that never got pulled into Brenthael's square because the inn refused to let the town have it. Thilim uses it for water and will not join the argument about pulling it down. Brenthael's warden wants it moved. The stone is in the way of a crowd that is not this house's crowd.

Food is the pot, the green-lot, whatever the extra mile pays in Hale-month. The shed is still a shed.

Features.

- The upper room — still too many beds; not converted. Opens in Hale-month. Quiet in Ledger-month. A devotion-column, a necessity-family, and a Road-hand going the other way with a pot can sleep in it in the same week. That passing is the two clocks in one afternoon. A prestige household that did not book the White Note's winter is rare and conspicuous.
- Seine's bed — Held. Seine of the far cape, tenth summer, not come. The mother said next year. Next year was last year — and has been, for a length of time Thilim will not convert into Cut-years. Not a shrine Thilim will admit. A shrine everyone else can see.
- The slate — still kept. Verso still does not match recto. Full text in the Walking Years, above.
- The stone — at the lintel-road, not in Brenthael's square. Climbing-scuff anyway. Road-hands still aim for the water. Brenthael wants it down so the extra mile does not look like a requirement on their approach. Thilim will not move a name.
- Green-lot and shed — still a pot and a shed. A cutting in the pot that is still not a Tree (Thilim missed a green, once; it is not the First Cut).
- Brenthael's square (neighbour, not a second type) — Tree at the centre; road ends at the boughs; Leaf-Fall as civic season; lodging-guild pressure from Orenbren without a throne. Mixed Kinds. No Kind-quarters. The town's leftover is the extra mile as holiday. They can see the inn's stone from the last house and resent it as a grave that is also an advertisement.

Clock 1: Brenthael Turns at home. The Near Mile is optional. Orenbren houses the people who still want the origin.

Clock 2: the stone still waters a mile; Seine's name is still on a lintel; a necessity-family from thinner soil still pays on the home-walk. Hands can un-Hands — if Brenthael's Tree sickened, this house would be the neighbour's week. It has not. Thilim does not narrate the age as over.

The two fates of the same origin still stand. The White Note collected, on a Strandoren quay. The Third Hearth kept making the bed.

People. Thilim — the four Long-Lived I walked jobs, inland and tired. Blood-Read will give a true fragment. It will not tell you which job they are doing when they make the bed. Brenthael's town-warden — unnamed; wants the stone. Practice-first. Speaks a fall in a square that used to be a road. Orenbren lodging-custom — hospitality as rent in Eolthael; Thilim charges less and is called a failure for it. The compact does not own this mouth. The First Seat sits in the Motherwood beside this country and is not its crown. A pilgrim who asks Thilim where the college is will be pointed at the wood, not the inn.

A chalked complaint from Brenthael's warden-hearth, carried to the third lintel and left under the stone's lip. C.Y. 387, after Hale-month. Thilim has not answered on paper.

The crowd will need the approach. Your stone is a mile that is no longer owed. Water we have. Names we can keep on a ribbon in the square, which is where a leftover belongs.

You house the extra mile. We Turn at home. If you make a shrine of a bed, that is a house matter. A stone in the road is a town matter.

We are not pulling a grave. We are pulling a requirement that has ended.

Thilim cannot afford to see that Brenthael is telling a Hands truth, or that “a ribbon in the square” is how a town files a name it no longer has to drink from. The Held bed is made. If Seine comes, the stone will still be in the way of a crowd that is not hers.

Ornsael

A Rain-Shadow walk-hold. (orn-SAYL · orn “land, ground” + sael “sowing” = “the sown-ground.”)

Conservative drift: th is not in the name, and the holy sound is still in the mouths — they are the Motherland's dry east, still walking west after the core stopped. Everyday Ornsael; core travellers will try the west-road well and be corrected. A well-town — a few hundred hearths, thinner than the core's. Not Saelthael's capital. Not a Fox kingdom.

East of Maiethorn's central range, on the leeward side away from the inner sea: dry hills, sand-country, towns at wells and at whatever graft will take. Ornsael is one of those wells. A Tree stands beside it — young for the Motherland, old enough to have Turned local children some years and not a certainty this one. The core stopped walking. Ornsael did not. Children still go west in the neighbour's week, or further, because a well-Tree is not a certainty.

Saelthael is the polity of people who still sow. Ornsael is a square of that habit, not a throne. Plenty sits on the other side of the range. Pilgrimage here is a leftover they cannot retire. Core pilgrims who arrive in Eolthael expecting a holiday extra mile find a necessity-column already on the west-road, and are shocked. They thought waiting was a Heskoren feeling.

Fox of the Sands hearths are densest here. That is terrain, not a flag. A town with no fox-born would be the thing worth asking about. Mixed Kinds drink the same well.

Leftover job on this street: necessity. The west-road is the neighbour's week. Devotion belongs to people who already have a healthy canopy. Prestige does not book a dry hill.

Site. The well is why anyone stopped. The range takes the rain; this side keeps the dust. Settlement is nucleated around water the way Harrow's is nucleated around wood — same grammar, different scarcity. The graft was married to the well on purpose: living earth wants a drink in sand-country as much as a child does.

The west-road is the main street. It used to be how you reached a healthier canopy, then how you reached the origin, then how you reached the core's Hands-towns after those towns stopped coming east. It is still how this year's ten-year-olds go, when the well-Tree is thin or the fall is missed. Beyond the last house the road is a pale cut toward the range-pass. East of the well it peters into tracks and Taken-In plantings that look like stubbornness.

Water is the well, a few cisterns, dew-catch on the north walls. Food is terrace-gardens, goats, whatever the west-road pays when it still pays. Fuel is dung and what the range-trade carries over. The Taken-In are backbone here — thirsty land honours green — and they are not a nation.

No walls. The boundary is where the well's courtesy ends and the dust does not.

The square.

- The Tree at the well — civic and sacred heart, even when the wood is a maybe. Some years it Turns. Some years the colour is late, or thin, or the warden will not call a fall that isn't. A missed Eolthael still shuts the Given-door. Struck remains the later mercy. There is still no second-chance year.
- The west-road — Clock 2 as a street. Mile-markers toward the pass; one stone still in the well-square because the town grew around a day's water, not around a finished Hand. Climbing-scuff. Ribbons pointed west, which core children find backwards.
- The well-market — stalls in the morning shade. Fox-born densest in the crowd, not gated. A fox-market without the town being a Kind. Stock ancestries, a Tengu on a pass-errand, a Selkie who married in from Eolstrand and is dry and funny about it.

- The greens — potted, hauled, argued over. No lush lot. A cousin of the greens-keepers' craft might winter. They will not follow you home, and home is dust if they did.
- The ranging — dry hills, night-work, Two-Bodied who know the difference between a sand-fox and a Fox. At the edge, not a quarter.
- The far shed — Returned work downwind of the well, because you do not put the dead on the drink. No infirmary. A travelling stiller is a pass-story.

Homes bend to becomings: north-side cool rooms, green pots on lintels, shutters that open for a Far-Voiced hour because there is no hall to book. Thin infrastructure, high theology, low governance — Saelthael's combination at eye level.

Clock 1: this is Maiethorn. The Motherland. Hands-country in the core. Conservative mouths. The extra mile is supposed to be optional.

Clock 2: the well-Tree is not a certainty; children still go west; the road that used to go further still does. Same sael as Saelvaeth on the live front — sowing on two continents. Both are this year.

Hands can un-Hands. A well-graft that sickens puts a Motherland square back on the neighbour's week. That is weather, not a fall of the age. The Seat will call thin soil. The town will call this year. Vaethorn-guilt imported to sand that never asked for it is the injustice: waiting read as unworthiness on the continent that invented plenty.

Inscrutable, on purpose: children put a pinch of well-sand in the west-facing shoe before they walk. Core pilgrims find sand in their own shoes and do not know who did it. Ornsael will not explain. The pass takes the rest.

Offices. Town-warden — practice-first, not Kind. Tired of being asked if this is fox-country. May be Sands-Fox; may not. Either way the question is the slight. Speaks the fall when there is one; will not write a colour that didn't happen, even if a core clerk wants the year tidy. The square that watches, and the west-road that watches instead — some years the witness is local. Some years it has to walk home from a healthier canopy over the pass. Vouching-at-a-distance on the Motherland is the tell that Ornthael is unfinished. Road-hands — rare; the circuit prefers paying nexts. A pot for Ornsael is a fight with the queue. Saelthael-folk custom — light, town-wardens, wells as civic fact. No list. Threnmaieth would like one. Plenty next door is Maiethvaeth's problem, not this well's.

A west-road ribbon-count, kept on a lath by the well, Eolthael through Hale-month. No clerk's name. The verso is sand-scored.

Ribbons west: this week. Ribbons at the well: last fall, if you can call it. The core's extra mile came through on the fourth day and asked where the holiday was. We gave them water. They gave us a hymn. The children already had sand in the shoe.

If the Tree speaks we stay. If it does not we walk. I will not say which year we are in. I know which pass.

A man from the Reckoning asked to name the well on a roll. We named the well Ornsael, which it already was. He wrote something else. The sand does not keep his hand.

The lath cannot afford to see that the core's shock is the setting working, or that "which year we are in" is the two clocks asked of a well. Threnmaieth will file a west-road as piety or as a gap. It is a child who needs a canopy this week.

The three seats

Eolvaeth — Vaethorn's seat

(ay-ohl-VAYTH · eol "hinge" + vaeth "the waiting" = "the hinge-waiting.") Worn drift: th kept. Everyday pulpit Eolvaeth; folk-speech "Elvaeth" (el-VAYTH). The capital of Vaethorn because people walk here to wait, not because the canopy is a certainty. Warden: Vaethod (VAYTH-od). A pilgrim-town — a couple thousand souls in Ledger-month, more in Hale-month. Not Harrow's Green. Not the Three Hamlets Past the Ford. Not Saelvaeth's march.

A vale behind Heskoren's Strandoren-facing coast. One of the earlier pots on this continent — a C.Y. 200s graft that took, spoke some years, and never grew into a neighbour's certainty. The live front moved on. The waiting stayed. Congregation made a country: Vaethorn is the gospel; Eolvaeth is the square the gospel stands in.

It is not a throne. Governance here is almost absent. What sits in the vale is a Tree, a spring, a gift-hall that is worship, and the camp-streets of people who came for a hinge and did not leave. Custom outruns written law. The town-warden is Hands-folk, not a crown.

Saelvaeth's luck is a different weather, further along the wave. Harrow's Green is a Hand that grew up. The three hamlets can see that canopy from a ford. Eolvaeth cannot see it, and does not want to: wanting it would be admitting the wait is a queue. The gospel says stay. Horticulture, some years, says send.

Leftover job on this street: devotion — the wait as a pilgrimage destination. Necessity is what visitors from thinner districts are actually doing; the town will not call it that. Prestige does not book a thin vale.

Site. Two tracks meet at a spring in a fold of upland. The graft was married to the water because living earth wants a drink and a child does. Settlement clustered where the wood took — and then the camps filled the fold, because a thin Tree that might speak is still the oldest Hand a long walk can reach without crossing into Saelvaeth's orbit.

The spring is the day's drink. It is not a mile-shrine stone. Ribbons belong on other squares. Children leave a wet leaf on the lip the year the Tree does not speak. Travellers from the core will try to climb something. There is nothing to climb. That absence is a leftover: the Long Mile used to pass this vale when the neighbour was a continent; the requirement ended; the wait did not.

Food is the vale's gardens, ranging on the slopes, alms from the gift-hall pot, and whatever Hale-month mouths bring. Fuel is the same woods the Two-Bodied use as wild-leave. There is no resident stiller. A travelling blessing-surgeon is a decade's luck. The Taken-In are the backbone — Mother's green held in common, honoured, not a nation.

No walls. The boundary is the last camp-street and the ranging. Low governance looks like this: you can walk in, and someone will feed you, and no clerk will write you down.

The square. Nucleated around the canopy. Organic. The oldest lintels face the Tree; later houses filled the wedge between the tracks; camp-streets — cellular accretion of pilgrim-camps that learned to winter — run up the fold until they look like a town and still smell like a season.

- The Tree at the centre — civic and sacred heart, even when the wood is a maybe. Mature enough that grandparents remember a fall. Young enough, for a capital, that a Seat clerk would not call it a First. Some years it Turns. Some years the colour is late, or thin, or Vaethod will not call a fall that isn't. A missed Eolthael still shuts the Given-door. Struck remains the later mercy. There is still no second-chance year.
- The spring — the vale's reason. Wet-leaf years. Climbing-scuff on the lip anyway, from children who have heard the stone-story and will not be told this town has a different leftover.
- The gift-hall — worship and venting in the same room (ael-hall as congregation). A Far-Voiced hour here is a hymn whether they meant it to be. No counted hall. No release-house ticket.
- The camp-streets — adaptive reuse at town scale. A tent-line that became a lintel. Hale-month still doubles the mouths. Ledger-month is local and guilty about the empty rooms.
- Mother's green — commons around the Tree, enough, not a lot with a ticket. They will not follow you home. Home is the vale if they did.
- The wild-leave — ranging on the slopes, at the edge, not a beast-yard. No Kind-flag on the trees.
- The far shed — Returned work downwind of the spring. Not an infirmary. Not a district.

Homes accommodate becomings. Mixed Kinds. A Fox of the Wilds at the ranging is unremarkable. A Tengu on a spine-visit is a guest. A Selkie who married in from the coast is wet about the vale and kept anyway.

Tithe-provision is alms and congregation: real warmth, real want. You can be too poor to stay whole here, and the gospel will console what it cannot furnish.

Clock 1: Hands-children who did Turn at this Tree. The Long Mile is supposed to be optional. The hinge is supposed to have arrived.

Clock 2: the Tree is not a certainty; camp-streets still fill for Eolthael; some years a cohort still goes toward Saelvaeth's luck, or further if that luck is full. The gospel says wait. The Seat's horticulture, on a thin year, says send. Vaethod has done both. The town remembers which summers.

Devotion is the job on the street: people walk to Eolvaeth to wait together. That is how a poor land gets a capital without a crown. It is not Orenbren's extra mile (those people already have a healthy canopy). It is not the hamlets' necessity (those kitchens can see Harrow's). It is the wait made into a destination, which is also how scarcity becomes unworthiness if you let the sermon land.

Inscrutable, on purpose: the wet leaf on the spring. Core pilgrims ask if it is a ribbon. Elvaeth will not explain. The year the Tree speaks, there is no leaf. The year it does not, there are too many to count, and no one files the count.

Offices. Town-warden (Vaethod) — Hands-folk, practice-first, not Kind. Speaks the fall truly enough for a waiting-seat. Will not write a colour that didn't happen, even if a visiting clerk wants the hinge tidy. The year they send a cohort toward Saelvaeth is the year the gospel and the wood disagree. They have not resigned. The square that watches, and the camp-streets that watch instead — some years the witness is local. Some years it has to walk home from a luckier Hand. Vouching-at-a-distance on a gospel-capital is the tell that waiting is still a road. Road-hands passing through — they sleep in the town that was chosen early and stayed thin, on the way to a town that was not chosen this year. Vaethorn-folk custom — light state, hot faith, alms. No list. Threnmaieth would like one. Ornled would not understand why anyone stays.

The unvouched Struck are the ache this seat was built to meet with faith rather than machinery. A congregation deciding whether faith or fear wins is a session, not a district.

A notice chalked on the gift-hall lintel, Eolthael, C.Y. 387. Vaethod's hand. The Tree is not named as sick.

The hinge is this week. Beds on the camp-streets first. A mouth that came to wait is a mouth. A mouth that came to count us is a clerk, and I can tell.

If the Tree speaks we stay. If it does not I will not invent a colour. I will not send until the week is over. I have sent before. I will not pretend I have not.

The spring is not a stone. Leave the leaf if you must. Do not ask me what it buys. It buys nothing. That is why we leave it.

Vaethod cannot afford to see that “I have sent before” is the Harrow-sentence said from the other side of the wave, or that a capital whose Tree might not speak is the setting working. The gospel will hear the notice as a slight even if it is only a week. Both are telling the truth they have.

Orentel — Lestrand’s seat

(or-EN-tel · eroded oren + thael = “the witnessing-Tree,” th worn to t.) Everyday Orentel; Lestrand-folk will say the Salt Quay and mean the city the way they say the bed-house and mean the bank. The capital of Lestrand because notes and berths meet here, not because a house sits a throne. The White Note House is on the third quay, north side — placed, not crowned. Factor: Sorim (SOR-im). A salt-city — tens of thousands; the Tree-town is the smaller half.

An inner-sea estuary on Strandoren, facing Maiethorn across the oldest water in the world. The Salt Walk used to land here. When the walk stopped being required on this coast, the berths did not empty — they changed jobs. Adaptive reuse at city scale: a Tree-town that grew a quay, then a second quay, then a leap-frog of warehouses along the tide, until the nucleated square was the smaller half of a salt-city.

Lestrand is guild self-rule carried as far as it goes. Orentel is the square that proves it: a charter-council of houses and craft-guilds, no crown, no Threnhael. Citizenship-by-witness runs smoothly because reach is high. The three pillars are infrastructure. An unvouched person is a transaction that cannot clear.

Leftover job on this street: prestige — the First-Hand year as a product; empty Eolthael berths held for households who can pay to walk a walk they do not need. Necessity still eats in the lofts; Mataero files it as occupancy.

Site. The estuary is why anyone stopped. Deep water, a sheltered sound, a tide that writes the working day. The graft took on the rise above the first quay — C.Y. 40s–80s, wealthy coast, a paying next — and the oldest lintels still face that Tree. The road used to come inland from the berth toward a healthier origin-canopy. Then this canopy grew up. Then the berth became the point.

Water is the tide, cisterns on the rise, and paid wells in the warehouse-leap. Food is the river-plain, the inner-sea catch, whatever the crossing pays. Fuel is drift, peat, and what the factor-houses book. The Taken-In rent leaf-lots by the season; they are not a nation. Selkie hearths are densest on the water — a lot of shoreline, not a gate.

No walls that matter. The boundary is the last crane and the ranging-yard inland. Low governance looks like this: the council charters the guild, never the person.

Hallowquay is a lesser inner quay, not the capital. A fox-born broker might still be of Hallowquay. That byname was already in the world; the seat is Orentel.

The square. Composite: nucleated Tree-town on the rise, linear quays along the tide, leap-frog warehouses where a fire or a silted berth made the next stretch cheaper than rebuilding. The interesting streets are the edges where the rise meets the salt.

- The Tree at the centre — still the civic heart, even when the money is downhill. Mature Hand. Leaf-Fall is a civic and commercial milestone: a family's colour is watched for what guild it opens. Warm it is not. The square still Turns local children for free. That free is the leftover the quay cannot price without noticing itself.
- The first quay — the Salt Walk's old landing. Empty Eolthael berths held as prestige; wool through Hale-month covering a shrine. A smell of earth out of season when a pot, not a child, is the passenger.
- The third quay, north side — the White Note House. Ledan's desk. Mataero's loft in the rise behind, twelve beds, north bed not to let. Century instruments. The house is a mouth, not a council. Lestrاند will only count it as success.
- The release-house — ael-hall as playhouse and outlet, ticketed. Superb if you can pay. The queue outside it is the have-and-have-not gap at eye level.
- The leaf-lots — rented green, not Mother's common. They will not follow you home, and home is a loft if they did.
- The beast-yard — hired ranging at the inland edge, not a wild-leave. Two-Bodied haulage is a trade dynasty if the match was priced that way.
- The ticket-infirmaries — the Stillers on the downwind edge. Excellent. For those who can reach them. The queue is longest here too.
- The far shed — Returned work past the last crane. Same logic as a tannery.

Homes accommodate becomings. Mixed Kinds. A Sands-Fox at a desk is unremarkable if they have warranting. The shadow economy (smuggled green, sold vouching, off-book Terms) is alleys the guilds pretend not to charter.

Clock 1: this canopy Turns at home. The Salt Walk is optional. The bed-house collected.

Clock 2: empty Eolthael berths are still shaped like a landing; pots still take a child's space; a First-Hand year can be booked as a winter. Hands can un-Hands — if Orentel's Tree sickened, this quay would be the neighbour's week. It has not. The council does not narrate the age as over. It narrates occupancy.

Prestige is the job on the street: the walk you do not need, sold. That is how a rich coast gets a capital without a crown. Devotion that lands here is a hymn the release-house will schedule. Necessity in the loft is Mataero's eye, not the city's brand.

Inscrutable, on purpose: salt on the Tree's roots in Eolthael. They say it is the tide. The tide does not reach the rise. Orentel will not explain. A Hall-keeper will schedule around it. A Book-hand will not put it in a Term.

Offices. The charter-council — houses and craft-guilds. Watches the guild, never the individual. Sorim is a factor who can be asked who chartered the empty berths this Eolthael. They will answer in occupancy. They are not Ledan. Tree-tenders — Lestrands word for wardens. Practice-first, not Kind. Speak the fall as a civic fact. A colour that opens a guild is still a colour. The White Note House — Ledan writes; Mataero lets. The north bed is house custom. Two fates, two lintels. The Book-Hands — ordinary on this quay. Signing-watch as prestige if you book it. They do not rewrite Bound Terms. They do not sit a seat. Road-hands / graft-carts — rare; a pot on an Eolthael berth is cargo in the clerk's mouth.

The Tithe-poor fade while the city steps around them. That is the injustice. Nothing is policed. Everything is priced.

A berth-slate, first quay, Eolthael through Hale-month, C.Y. 387. Sorim's hand. The Tree is not mentioned.

Eolthael berths 1–4: held. Do not load wool. A First-Hand year is not cargo. I have explained this to the crane.

Berth 5: earth. A pot is cargo. I have explained this to the family who wanted 5 for a child. They could not hold 1–4. I did not invent the hold.

The rise still Turns for free. That is a Tree-tender matter. The quay is a hold matter. If you need both in one week you are in the wrong mouth.

White Note, third north: not a berth. Do not send me their conversions. I do not keep house-years.

Sorim cannot afford to see that “I did not invent the hold” is the market's injustice said as competence, or that salt on the roots is a leftover the slate will not schedule. Ledan will hear the slate as a neighbour who cannot convert. Mataero will hear occupancy. Both are telling the truth they have.

The White Note House (placed, not crowned)

A road-house that became a desk. A deathless house of the trusted note. Ledan writes century-loans from a founding-summer the house calls the White Note's count. Mataero (mah-TAY-ro) lets the loft. The north bed is house custom — not to let — a founding-name the junior is not to copy onto a term. Everyday the White Note; Lestrands still says the bed-house and means the bank. Founding $\approx$ C.Y. 80 (White Note year 200 = Cut-year 280, per Ledan's conversion-problem). The quay-desk sits on Orentel's third quay, north side; the inland loft is in the rise behind. The desk is not the crown.

The same fortune as the Third Hearth, later. In Brenvaeth the house was beds, porridge, and credit for a walk you could not miss twice. When the walk stopped being required in the core, the Long-Lived still remembered every debtor, and the paper outlived the pilgrimage-season. The desk sat down on Orentel's third quay because that is where notes now move. The inland upper room is occupancy — twelve beds in the rise behind the salt, looking at a Tree that still Turns for free.

What it sells now: century instruments, trusted paper, a First-Hand year you can book (the held-over winter as product), loft-terms to wool through Hale-month, and — still — the old kind of note for a necessity-family: eat now, pay on the home-walk. Same paper, two jobs. The clerk who files both as occupancy cannot afford to see the difference.

The north bed is how a bank proves it used to be an inn. Empty is not a shrine, Mataero says. Empty is a bed they are not charging for. Ledan says the house is the same mouth. The founding-book has a name. Thilim, inland, still holds a far-cape name the White Note does not. Lestrاند will only count this house as success. Orentel's charter-council will only count it as one ticket among many.

Features. The quay-desk — third quay, north side, Orentel. Ledan's count; conversions to Eoloren-count when a court makes them; three dates for one summer still a live query. The inland loft — in the Tree-town rise, not on the water. Twelve beds in Mataero's slate; eight let; four open for Eolthael; north bed not to let. The founding-book — Held names as credit-tokens. Not read aloud on a term. A smell of earth out of season — when a pot, not a child, is the passenger. Cargo, the clerk files. Next berth over, a First-Hand year is not cargo. Sorim will not convert that either.

No mortal court can check a Long-Lived's memory of a ford two hundred summers back. That is why the note holds. It is also why a grandchild can owe a walk they cannot point to. Spreading Trees did not make the paper kind.

Maiethlir — Threnmaieth's seat

(my-eth-LEER · maieth “Mother” + lir “thaw” = “the Mother's thaw.”) Conservative drift: th kept. Everyday Maiethlir. The capital of Threnmaieth because this is where they started counting a hearth that was already holy — not because they own Thaeloren. The First Seat sits in the Motherwood beside this country and is not its crown. Speaker: Rithim (RITH-im). A counted city — smaller than Orentel, older; the clerks will tell you a number after every Eolthael.

A thaw-river town on Maiethorn, in the Sacred Core and not in the grove. Snowmelt comes down from Lirorn's range; the river runs toward the inner sea. Maiethlir sat down where the water slowed enough to hold a Hand — an origin-town of the C.Y. 0–40s, a day's living-earth from the wood, on a different road than Orenbren's Near Mile. Orenbren lodges the approach. This river counted the people who stayed.

The extra mile used to come through with the thaw. When Hands made the origin-walk optional, the lodging emptied toward Orenbren's beds. The rooms did not stay empty. Clerks filled them. Adaptive reuse at city scale: a pilgrimage-street that learned house-names on a tablet.

Threnmaith coils near the sacred centre and wants everyone on the Threnhael. Maiethlir is the square that proves the coil without owning the Tree: the colour that falls is a hymn and a line. Maiethvael shares the Mother and refuses the list — same hymns, opposite paper, a day's argument upriver or down.

Leftover job on this street: devotion — the extra mile as civic season, layered under the roll. The job is not "the census" as a postcard. Necessity still sleeps in an uncounted loft if the soil up-range is thin; prestige books a counted winter. The Threnhael sits on a leftover. It does not replace it.

Site. The thaw-river is why anyone stopped. Ford, mill, a Hand planted beside the water because the first carrying followed living earth and a day's drink. The Motherwood is a dark on one horizon. You can walk to the grove. Most Hands-children do not. The college is in those clearings. It is not this square.

Water is the river, conduits the crown maintains, cisterns in the old pilgrim-streets. Food is the Core's plenty. Fuel is the wood's edge, which the Seat will not let a crown cut without a leave — proximity is pressure, not ownership. The Taken-In work the tended green the crown furnishes; they are not a nation.

A wall exists and is old. It was for floods and for a generation of argument, not for a siege the Core no longer expects. The interesting streets are inside it, where the old extra-mile meets the tablet-hall.

The square. Concentric around the canopy, then radial along the river and the old extra-mile. Ordered the way a counted city becomes ordered: not a grid drawn last week, an accretion that learned numbers.

- The Tree at the centre — a mature Hand, not the First. Civic and sacred heart. Leaf-Fall is a joyous holy day that is also a state registration. The colour is Spoken. A clerk waits to copy it. Rithim Speaks. They do not always let the copy happen in the same breath.
- The tablet-hall — the Threnhael's local mouth. Not the Tree. Beside it. Names, colours, marriages of heritable Conditions noticed. Outsiders hear "the Counting." Clerks say they keep the realm hale.
- The counted hall — ael-hall as outlet and attendance. A Far-Voiced hour furnished through the crown's channel. To be cut off is framed as your lapse.
- The old extra-mile — still a street. Upper rooms that used to sleep pilgrims are clerk-dorms. A Held bed would offend the roll; the roll has not found all of them. The Watching keep a room under a chapel the wardens recut (the Grown-Over).

- The tended green — crown-furnished commons. They will not follow you home. Home is on file if they did.
- The ranging-roll — Two-Bodied leave at the edge, noticed. Not a Kind-flag.
- The crown-stiller — excellent medicine, downwind, through the channel. The Bound are watched past their hazard, dressed as safety.
- The far shed — Returned work past the last conduit. Filed.

Homes accommodate becomings, and the accommodation is on the tablet. Mixed Kinds. A Fox of the Snows down from Lirorn is a guest with a name. The late week here is unfiled, which is the local crime.

The clerks will tell you a number. It changes after every Eolthael.

Clock 1: this canopy Turns at home. The Near Mile is Orenbren's job. The extra mile is a civic season. The Motherwood is a walk, not a requirement.

Clock 2: the thaw-road still brings a necessity-family when up-range soil is thin; an uncounted loft still smells like Hale-month; Hands can un-Hands. The roll would like those summers filed. The leftover is the pilgrimage the clerks moved into.

Devotion is the job on the street: people still come because the hinge is holy. The Threnhael is the layer — a tablet beside the Tree, not instead of it. That is how a pious core gets a capital without capturing the grove. The injustice is that the layer learned to withhold the green.

Inscrutable, on purpose: the thaw-river runs louder the week before Leaf-Fall. Clerks file it as snowmelt. Watchers do not. Maiethlir will not explain. Rithim will Speak over it. A clerk will wait for the water to quiet before copying.

Offices. Speaker / town-warden (Rithim) — Reckoned Hands pressure, practice-first, not Kind. Speaks the fall truly. The copy is a second, lesser seeing. Some summers they let it happen in the same breath. Some they do not. The crown has not replaced them. The Seat has not recalled them. That gap is load-bearing. The tablet-clerks — Long-Lived among them, memory bent to the census rather than free to check it. A crown-archivist who remembers what a line was made to overwrite is a hook, not a name yet. The First Seat — in the Motherwood, beside, a college not a throne. Some Speakers cooperate with the roll (they believe they are keeping the realm hale). Some refuse. A pilgrim who asks Rithim where the college is will be pointed at the wood, not the tablet-hall. Orenbren lodging — a day's argument along the other road. They witness who slept, not what colour. Threnmaieth would like the lodging-rolls. Watchers in the oldest district — a second reading alongside, not over. Filed as the Grown-Over. No seat.

The Kept are pitied and noted as unmarked. A household whose bloodline and upkeep are both on file cannot easily refuse the crown anything.

A Threnhael copy-slip, tablet-hall, Eolthael, C.Y. 387. The Speaker's name is on the recto. The clerk's hand is on the verso. The Tree is named as hale.

Recto, Rithim. Spoken: storm-grey. Witnessed in the square. The hug was not this child's. I have said the colour. I have not said the line. The river was loud. I will not wait for it.

Verso, clerk. Copied: Two-Bodied, named to the Threnhael, household already on file. Speaker delayed the copy until after the hymn. Delay noted. River-noise noted as snowmelt. The unmarked in the same household noted. Provision continues through the counted channel.

The wood was asked whether the Speaker is a Reckoned Hand. The wood did not answer in this hall.

Rithim cannot afford to see that "I have not said the line" is the only refusal the roll still has to metabolize, or that a loud river is a leftover the verso will file as weather. The clerk cannot afford to see that the delay is the leftover: a pilgrimage-town that still thinks the hymn comes first. Both are telling the truth they have. The First Seat, asked later, will say the Tree witnessed. That is also true.

Appendix: GM Canon

GM only — Conditions

- A Tithe's dangerous edge is story pressure, never a gotcha and never a seizure of the player's character. Consequences land on the Conditioned person's own body, memory, Stress, or immediate surroundings unless a feature explicitly says otherwise. Nobody's will is bent.
- Long-Lived. "Go still" is not a death move. It is a slow, tragic off-ramp the player can see coming for several rests. Use it as story pressure — a Long-Lived NPC found statue-still in a sealed archive — not a sudden kill. Blood-Read is investigative and emotional (the dead man's last sight; why a witness lies), never feeding, never damage, never a drain. The threshold courtesy is pure roleplay: a Long-Lived can cross uninvited if they truly must; they simply never do, and the manners run bone-deep. Do not let a table weaponize either into "the vampire rules."
- Two-Bodied. The forced shift is timing and inconvenience, never control. The inner voice is a roleplay partner, not a second player: it can want, argue, sulk, and celebrate, but it never rolls, never acts, and never overrides a choice. If a table finds the animal "made me do it," pull it back to nagging. Hold the line on size, no-myth, and no hands / no person's mind / no speech / no tools, so a Two-Bodied out-animals a Tengu or an Answered without out-personing them.
- Returned. Refuse to Fall is "hard to keep down," not immortality: a scar every time, out of the current scene, back by the next long rest. When the last Hope slot would go, they cannot come back. A lapsed Purpose is quiet crisis, not punishment. Whose hand: a Returned is Struck by the Quiet Tally (Threnvaeth) — the household clerk of leftover purpose — under the Leaf-Mother's allowance. She does not Give this at the Tree; she authorizes the catch. The unfinished business is still theirs; Threnvaeth does not puppet the Purpose. Do not put that in player-facing text.
- Bound. The Whisper is strictly suggestive — plausible lies and intrusive thoughts the player can reject at a Stress cost. Never puppet the PC. The Pledge is a known, dreaded horizon toward the Unbound, not a surprise. Whose hand: the Counterparty is Orledd — the household Hand who answers a sworn ask. The face chosen at creation (demon / cosmic-horror / unknown) is a mask; the terms are the same shape. Do not play Orledd as a devil, and do not retcon Given Conditions into bargains.

- The Unbound. The Quiet is a temptation engine, not a compulsion: every “reach for the bargain” beat is refusable at a Stress cost. The tragedy to play toward: an Unbound who stops connecting gets loud inside, signs again to quiet it, pays another Pledge, and slides toward the Given-Over. Warmth is the only thing that actually fills the hole; contracts only mute it.
- Far-Voiced. The Cry is a feeling landing on listeners — Stress, never a forced action or belief. A Struck Far-Voiced’s first Cry, pre-guild, is a formative beat, not a punishment. A Given Far-Voiced in deep Tithe-debt (0 tokens, on duty, in a courtroom or relay tower) is a slow-building set-piece.
- The Stilled. The seizing is strictly self-directed — the Stilled’s own limb, or harmless scenery, never another PC’s autonomy. A Struck Stilled’s first, unpracticed use of the gaze (probably on someone they love, probably by accident) is formative. A Given Stilled deep in Grey-debt on a riot line or in an operating theatre is a slow-building set-piece.
- The Answered. Every 0-token consequence stays on the Answered and their immediate surroundings. Let the chosen element define the character’s whole voice (an Ember-Answered feels nothing like a Root-Answered). One of the Answered deep in Tithe-debt walking into a crowded hall, a ship’s hold, or a dry archive is a slow-building set-piece.
- The Taken-In. Go-to-seed is strictly environmental — growth from ground and structures, never roots seizing another creature. A Struck Taken-In’s uncertainty (“did I walk out, or was I sent?”) is quiet identity dread, not a hidden puppet-string; the wild in them is part of them, not a master. One dragged deep into a dungeon, a ship’s hold, or a stone keep and left to wilt is a slow-building set-piece.
- Phoenix. Run two engines together: the count (let everyone watch the Hope slots go; each rising costs something the player feels — a face, a reason they started — not just a slot) and the fishbowl (never anonymous; every town has those who revere, worship, hunt, and hate them, often the same crowd). Never force a Rise; it is always the player’s death-move choice alongside the standard three. A Phoenix may choose Blaze of Glory and end if the story earns it. The fire boons are strong on purpose: compensation for a life with no privacy and a death you can count down to. As a legendary NPC, rebirths make era-markers (the same soul, met three times, remembering the party less each time).

GM only — Peoples

Distribution is a reach-tell only for the Yumboes. Mainland Kind-hearths are mundane geography (foxes in woods, seals on coasts, crows on ridges). Kumbaan’s isolation is the one Kind-fact that also maps the keystone edge: no Tree, no Gift, a people who are themselves without her. Do not let a player-facing read treat “Yumboes have no Conditions” as a racial immunity — it is a place fact.

Do not grow Kind-nations later. If a later settlement wants a “fox principality,” make it a Rain-Shadow polity that happens to be Fox-dense, running on the same theology / reach / governance axes as everyone else. The moment a government is for a Kind, the two-layer model has started to rot.

The lost fourth Fox is a grandmother, not a plot coupon. If you ever spend it, spend it as folklore that stayed when a hearth died (a vanished dry-lake, a wood that was cut) — not as a secret ancestry feature waiting in a drawer.

Two names is a Kind × place tell, not a secret identity. Players should hear it in ordinary introductions. The smaller inscrutable bits: the lost fourth Fox-word; a Yumboe who does take a mainland byname (they have decided to stay); a Threnmaieth clerk who refuses to record hearth-names (the roll wants one name only).

Do not write sentences in Kusawe or Gonan. If a scene needs an in-group word, coin one word from the inventory and gloss it. Deep grammar is deferred.

Each polity's vocabulary is its self-justification, not the truth of what it does. Threnmaieth's "keeping-whole" (Threnhael) is surveillance that calls itself care; Lestrand's "the free" for the Kept is a market reframing a social slight as a virtue; Vaethorn's "the Waited" wraps real pity in reverence. None of these framings is dissolved by confirming the Mother — they are how each society launders its own injustice, and a kind Mother does not make any of the three names honest.

Etymology is a quiet keystone tell. Thaeloren = "the Tree that witnesses" is not decoration: the Tree genuinely does witness (she is real, and the Leaf-Fall is her seeing each child). The language preserves a truth the skeptics have explained away. Do not gloss it in player-facing text as mere poetry; let a scholar-PC notice it. Reserve the noticing of buried meanings for a scholar-PC or a reveal beat; don't front-load them.

Drift is GM-legible as the reach-edge. The daughters drift furthest where the Trees are thinnest — the same bounded-reach edge that stays GM-side elsewhere. In-world the erosion reads as plain distance-and-trade (true, as far as it goes); the deeper pull that conserves the tongue near the Trees is the Mother's nearness. Same fact, two readings. History adds a mechanism: the pilgrimage itself was a conserving pull (far mouths walked to the same grove each year). Local Trees let daughters grow in place — Hands-era weather on a Walking-era root.

GM only — Society and Faiths

The Leaf-Mother is real, and she is benevolent — but her reach is not infinite, and giving costs her. She exists. The Turning Trees are genuinely her hands; when a Tree chooses, she is choosing. The Conditions are real gifts; the Leaf-Fall is an act of love; the Tithe is the honest weight of a gift, not a hidden price or a trap. She is bounded, not boundless. She cannot lay a hand on every child, cannot reach every threshold in time, and cannot give without spending. The limit is real. She is doing her best against it.

The Kept are spared — and some are simply past her edge. A hug and no colour is, for most, a deliberate and kind choice: the gift of being left whole. But the constraint means the Kept are not all one thing — some are chosen for wholeness, and some are children she could not reach far enough to give to this turning, held safe rather than gifted. She does not tell them apart, and neither can they. Both are held; not both are chosen.

The Struck are still hers — at the farthest reach of her arm. She Gives at the Tree; she does not Strike. The catch at the door is enacted by lesser gods of her household, each restricted to one door, working under her allowance. The Struck are still hers because those hands are hers to send. Narrow-Hand is right that she Gives only at the Tree. Wide-Hand is right that those means are still hers — her household, her allowance, her catch at the edge. Neither holds the whole.

R2: her benevolence does not dissolve injustice. Her kindness is cosmological, not social. She authored the gifts; she did not author the injustice built on top of them. The Watchful kingdom's register, unvouched-Struck suspicion, Bound over-watching, guild conscription of the Given, Tithe-need as leverage, the Kept pitied, the Given-Over's lost personhood, the scion-queue, the recut lintel, the book that will not close, the host of a dying guest, the sentence that will not travel, the week that will not end, the gate, the scheduled hour, the Grey as labor, the shop you cannot leave, the week no one writes — these are not misreadings of a kindness to be dissolved by the reveal. They are the moral spine of the setting. If a campaign ever confirms she is real and kind, that must not retroactively make the society just. The keystone answers is anyone there, and do they mean well (yes); it pointedly does not answer is what people built around her fair (often no). Protect that gap — it is where the play is.

The three corners do not share a mechanism of injustice. They share only that people built them. Vaethorn's guilt-theology of unworthiness, Lestrاند's let-the-poor-fade market, Threnmaieth's sanctified census — confirming she is kind does not make any of these three fair. Rival faiths can be used as leverage; they are not automatically the moral good because they dissent. Confirming she is kind does not dissolve Threnmaieth's counting of heretics, Lestrاند's priced fading, or Vaethorn's guilt-theology.

The household is still GM-only. She is first of a household: she Gives; lesser Hands Strike at restricted doors under her allowance. Do not confirm this in player-facing text. The Open Table's staying-kin are not of that household — do not absorb Kumbaan.

Each rival holds a true kernel and misses the whole.

- The Watching correctly remembers a Before and a cost, and a household before it was named Mother. They miss that the seeing is hers. The Masked reading (she is a later face) and the Bare Tree reading (there was never a she) are both playable. Neither is the answer. The lintel is a clue, not a verdict. The cost they remember is real; what was spent is still open. Do not give them a seat in a late reveal — that would turn the heretics into a second Motherfaith. The warmth lands through them, not as them.

- The Fair Hand is right about Bound (there is a Counterparty) and wrong that every becoming is a bargain. Mother's Gifts are still gifts. They misread a cost as a price. They have correctly felt that giving is not free. Do not play them as devil-worship. Do not let a Book-hand retcon a Given child into a debtor. Do not let a Book-hand rewrite the Counterparty's clause. A petition-watch is keeping the door; it is not acolyte-authority.
- The Old Ways are right that land-doors are real. They miss that she authorized the guests. Keep their grievance real (the grafts are late; the Motherfaith did talk as if becoming were new). Keep their miss intact. Ancestor-meals are not the Returned. The dead in the ground are kin who remained. The Returned are a different door.
- The Open Table is the cleanest experiment: no Gifts, rare Struck, a faith that was never hers. Their claim — we were never lacking — is still a late beat. Not ghosts. The unseen hands are furniture. "No one is a stranger twice" is courtesy with legal weight on the isle, a proverb on the quay — not a geas, not a trap-cult, not a Fair Hand contract. A wreck is not a Struck-door she authorized.

If a campaign ever works toward the keystone, the three old corners are the Watching, the Old Ways, and the Open Table — pre-Mother, pre-graft, and never-grafted. The Fair Hand is the modern misreading (commerce wearing a theology). Use all four; don't let one become the reveal-mouthpiece.

The Tree is player-facing but keystone-adjacent. The graft continuity ("every Tree is literally the one Tree's hand") is the physical fact that, followed to its end, confirms she is real and present. Present it as doctrine the faithful hold, never as demonstrated cosmology. Skeptics grant the grafting and deny the mind. Resist making the Tree eerie or the ceremony sinister. Dread lives in individual Tithes, not in the rite.

The schism is the reusable engine. The three questions (Kept, Struck, mind) are inexhaustible fuel for NPCs, factions, and family drama. Do not let a player-facing scene award the win to either branch. Believers see the hand and miss the edge; skeptics see the edge and miss the hand. The world is built so being a skeptic costs nothing day to day, which keeps the schism poignant rather than ironic.

The Child at Four Doors. The paradox is the point. The child cannot pick without already having been claimed, and cannot be claimed without picking. Each faith resolves the unbearable middle by making their door the one that was always open. None of the last lines is the true cosmology. The true cosmology is: a mother reached, at cost, and did not reach everyone the same way. The fable will not say that. Which ending an NPC offers is a faster stance-read than a speech about doctrine. Do not write an official fifth door. Do not close the keystone in a children's story. Reserve the warmth for the confirming beat, if it ever comes.

The Orenhael are right about the wood and incomplete about the hand. Every scion is continuous tissue of the one Tree, and when any warden Speaks a colour they are naming a choice she made.

Present them as competent neighbours, not as people who secretly know. A skeptic town-warden is good at the job and wrong about the mind. The queue is the parallax, not the Tree: the Seat sees soil and carrying-earth; the hamlet past the ford sees another year of borrowed Turnings. Which town gets the next graft is still a human rationing of her reach. Threnmaieth must not capture the Seat in the first sentence. Proximity is pressure, not ownership.

The Slide. They do not know what story they are in. They think they are in a rent-and-credit story. They want continuity of the week, not a victim they relish. A corpse is a ruined asset. Play them as patient, useful, and sure they helped. The town is complicit; do not make the week-keeper the only villain. Official Tithe-infra and the licence-guilds are the public / posted / counted version of furnishing. This house is the overflow those guilds pretend not to know. Off-book Bound brokerage and sold vouching stay nameless. They do not rewrite Terms, steal scions, or sell a false Turning-witness.

Official halls and greens. They think they are in a wells-and-yards story. They want a town that does not wilt, Cry, or seize in the square. They do not want a client. Every closed gate feeds a week-book. Comfort: the words share, hour, ticket, enough. She gave the Tithe; she did not build the lot.

Greens-Keepers. They want a living lot, not a client. A wilt on the lot is a ruined commons. A wilt off the lot is weather they have decided not to see. The buried leaf is how the lot remembers; a PC who digs it up has committed a local rudeness, not found a cosmology. The bed-slate is plants. If it is already a quiet census, that is Threnmaieth leaking, not the world's baseline.

Hall-Keepers. One lintel is the point. Far-Voiced are the seam Condition. The unswept bench is how the hall remembers; do not explain which Cry.

Stillers. They want a street that does not seize and a patient who lives. They do not want a register of the feared. Forever-hold of a person is ordinary violent crime, the code's one named horror. The Gaze never seizes a will. The doorknob is practical (a still knob is a tell), not a relic. Ticket-as-property is Lestrang's live argument, not world-law.

Element-Guilds. Four doors, one grammar. They want work that slakes and a room that does not let go. The last coal / yesterday's water / unwashed clay / unshut window are practical and not explained. Gale-Tengu is a lean. Ember-Drakona is a lean. Leans are not chapters.

The Intake. They want a quiet week. They do not want a client, a relic, or a route. Success is burned. Given children got a childhood the Struck will never get. Travel is accidental, not a circuit — a runner toward this person. Bound / Taken-In / Returned / Two-Bodied / Long-Lived are the wrong office.

The reach-edge stays GM-side as cause. Vaethorn's high Kept/Struck rates, Lestrang's and Threnmaieth's dense Given, the core-vs-frontier medicine gap — all read in-world as plain distance-and-biology (the skeptics' whole case). The real reason — her reach is bounded and thins where the Trees are thin — stays GM-side. Don't let a player-facing beat assert the cause. Vaethorn is the sharpest test of this: they are the place where a devout population most wants an explanation for the thin gift, and where the wrong (true) answer would land hardest.

Names encode the R2 guard, per polity. Each polity’s vocabulary is its self-justification, not the truth of what it does. Threnmaith’s “keeping-whole” (Threnhael) is surveillance that calls itself care; Lestrاند’s “the free” for the Kept is a market reframing a social slight as a virtue; Vaethorn’s “the Waited” wraps real pity in reverence. None of these framings is dissolved by the reveal.

The Long-Lived marriage is the setting’s quietest, most reusable ache. Reserve it for weight.

The cold embrace is a diagnostic and a hook. A Returned whose embrace has gone cold is a quiet family crisis.

Whoever furnishes a provided-for Tithe holds power over its bearer. That is the sharpest economic lever. Coercion with a friendly face — the scary edge in economic form.

Player-facing notes keep her unproven. Skeptics have their full dignity. Never let a player-facing beat confirm the Mother; the confirmation is the GM’s to place, and it should land as warmth and relief with an ache under it, not horror. There is no harvest, no betrayal waiting to be uncovered. The floor is sound — bounded, costly, and grieving, but sound.

Lands, ages, and places — GM

Player-facing notes keep her unproven. This appendix is what is actually true, regardless of what anyone in the world believes.

The Leaf-Mother

Yes. The Leaf-Mother is real, and she is benevolent — but her reach is not infinite, and giving costs her.

- She exists — a genuine, present power, not a metaphor and not a dead god whose name survived her.
- The Turning Trees are genuinely her hands. The town scions are not a natural phenomenon that people read as divine; they really are how she reaches into the world. When a Tree chooses, she is choosing.
- The Conditions are real gifts. The Leaf-Fall is an act of love: she looks at a child and gives them a becoming that the world will need and that they can carry. The Tithe is the honest weight of a gift, not a hidden price or a trap.

- She is bounded, not boundless. She is kind and finite. Her reach has an edge, and every gift she gives costs her something to give. She cannot lay a hand on every child, cannot reach every threshold in time, and cannot give without spending. This is not a flaw hidden under the warmth — it is why the warmth aches. A mother who could save everyone and didn't would be sinister; a mother who saves whom she can reach, at cost, and grieves the rest, is the one this world actually has. The limit is real. She is doing her best against it.
- The Kept are spared — and some are simply past her edge. A hug and no colour is, for most, a deliberate and kind choice: the gift of being left whole, wanted in its own right, not a failure or an oversight. But the constraint means the Kept are not all one thing — some are chosen for wholeness, and some are children she could not reach far enough to give to this turning, held safe rather than gifted. She does not tell them apart for us, and neither can they. Both are held; not both are chosen.
- The Struck are still hers — at the farthest reach of her arm. A becoming that arrives through a later threshold (a drowning, an oath, a death survived) is not a Condition that “escaped her.” She meets people at those doors too — but the threshold is the edge of her reach, not her ordinary hand. There she catches rather than gives: it is chancier, costlier, and not always in time. This is why the Struck feel “received” yet arrive without ceremony, and why they can feel a half-step outside the fold — they were reached for at the limit, not gifted at the centre.

She Gives at the Tree; she does not Strike. The catch at the door is enacted by lesser gods of her household, each restricted to one door, working under her allowance. The Struck are still hers because those hands are hers to send. Narrow-Hand and Wide-Hand are both half-right.

So: the believers are right about the big things — she is real, she is kind, the gifts are gifts. And the skeptics, though wrong that no one is there, are not entirely wrong: they have correctly felt the edge — the Kept who seem passed over, the Struck who arrive unmet by ceremony, the sense that the giving is not seamless. There is a seam; they have simply mislabelled a limit as an absence. No one in the world holds the whole shape: believers see the hand and miss the edge; skeptics see the edge and miss the hand. The faith is, underneath everything, true — and incomplete in exactly the way its own doubters sense.

The world keeps her as belief, not confirmed cosmology in-fiction — no one can prove her, revelation is quiet, and honest skeptics remain honest.

How it surfaces

Because she is quiet and genuinely kind, revelation is a slow accretion of coherence, not a single gotcha. Rough order of escalating certainty:

1. The gifts fit too well. Over a lifetime, a town notices that the Conditions Given tend to be the ones that town will need — as if something is looking ahead. Easy to dismiss as hindsight and survivorship bias (and the skeptics do).

2. The Kept are cared for, not merely skipped. Many Kept report the ceremony felt like a choice made for them, not an absence — but not all, and the difference nags. Hard to falsify; easy to call sentiment. Both readings are true of different Kept — some chosen, some past her edge — which is exactly why the testimony never resolves cleanly.
3. The reach has an edge. The quiet, best evidence of the constraint: remote hamlets far from any mature Tree run higher on the Kept and higher on the Struck; a Tree strains and a child goes ungifted where a central town's would not; the giving visibly thins where the Trees are thin. Reads mundanely as distance-and-biology (the skeptics' whole case) — but it is the shape of a bounded hand, not an absent one. That the reach has grown with the grafts is itself the quiet argument that a hand, not a climate, is behind it.
4. A Tree does something a phenomenon shouldn't. Rare, quiet moments where a scion acts with apparent intent (withholds a colour that would have doomed a child; a scion “reaches” — and sometimes visibly strains — for a specific person). Never flashy — always deniable.
5. The Struck are met — barely. Testimony from the Struck that the threshold felt received, as if someone reached for them from the far side of the door — but late, or thin, or at the very limit of arriving at all. The strongest experiential evidence and the clearest felt-sense of the edge; still only testimony.
6. The confirming beat. If the campaign ever truly confirms her, it should land as warmth and relief with an ache under it, not horror — the answer to “is anyone there?” is yes, she meant it kindly, and she is doing what she can against a limit. Reserve this; the setting works better with it withheld.

What players will think first

- “It's just what the Trees do.” The skeptic's reading — biology/phenomenon, no mind behind it. Sincere, common, and wrong about the mind — but they have genuinely seen the edge and mislabelled a limit as an absence. Safe to hold, and half-right, which is what makes it durable.
- “If she's real and kind, why the Tithes / why the Struck / why anyone Kept?” The schism's engine. These now have true answers with an ache in them (a gift has honest weight; she reaches the thresholds but only at the edge of her arm; some Kept are chosen for wholeness and some are simply past her reach) — but the answers aren't provable, so the questions stay live.
- “A kind god would save everyone.” The misreading the constraint invites — that a bounded mother isn't really benevolent. In-world this is a real theological wound; she is kind and finite, and the gap between them is where the grief lives. It does not solve into either omnipotence or indifference.
- The dark reading — that a benevolent front hides a harvest/betrayal. This setting rejects that. The floor is sound — bounded, costly, and grieving, but sound.

Her kindness does not launder society

The floor being sound at the divine layer does not make the social layer kind. People build genuinely unjust things on top of true gifts that she never authored and her kindness does not excuse: Struck stigma and legal suspicion, Tithe-infrastructure that becomes economic leverage over the Conditioned, guild conscription of the Given, communities that treat their Kept as spare labour or their feared Conditions (the Stilled, Bound) as things to be managed.

The keystone answers is anyone there and do they mean well (yes); it pointedly does not answer is the society people built around her just (often no). The moral tension of the setting lives in that gap.

Fifteen injustices, not one with hats. Maiethvael is not the “good” foil to Threnmaieth (piety as a social tax; the Kept pitied in plenty). Trenledd is not Threnmaieth without hymns made kinder (it is colder: no duty to keep you hale). Ornled is not freedom (no congregation-net). Confirming the Mother is kind launders none of them.

Vaethorn’s guilt-theology of unworthiness, Lestrاند’s let-the-poor-fade market, Threnmaieth’s sanctified census — three completely different injustices, all built by people on top of the same true gifts. If the campaign ever confirms she is real and kind, that must not make any of these three fair. They don’t share a mechanism of injustice — they share only that people built them.

The Tithes are honest costs, not divine leverage. A Tithe never seizes the PC.

The schism stays a good-faith disagreement, and the constraint makes it two-sided: believers hold the hand, skeptics hold the edge, neither holds the whole.

The Other Hands

The Leaf-Mother Gives. She does not Strike. The Struck are still hers — because the hands that catch at those doors are of her household, working under her allowance.

She is not exclusive. She is the first and greatest of a household. She Gives. She does not Strike. The Struck are the work of the Other Hands — lesser gods of her household, each with a restricted door and her allowance to reach through it.

The world still holds her as belief. The other faiths already describe these powers as they understand them. Confirmation is a late beat, and it should land as the household was always there, not as a gotcha pantheon dump.

The division of labour

Path	Who	Where	What
Given	the Leaf-Mother alone	a healthy Turning Tree at Leaf-Fall	she looks, she chooses, she Gives. Long-Lived, Two-Bodied, Answered, Phoenix are hers only — no Other Hand may grant them
Struck	one Other Hand, by her allowance	that Hand's own door (death, oath, drowning, stone, wild)	they may grant only their Condition, only at that door, only within her allowance
Both	Mother or the relevant Hand	Tree or door	Far-Voiced / Stilled / Taken-In can be Given at ten or Struck later. Same Condition; different hand; different person at the table

She cannot (or will not) Give a death or a contract to a ten-year-old — those doors do not open at Leaf-Fall. That is why Returned and Bound are Struck-only.

The household

Five Hands, five doors, five Conditions that can arrive without a leaf. Each is restricted: one door, one grant, her allowance. They are not a dark court and not a rival pantheon. They are family labour — the work she cannot do at the Tree without breaking what a gift is.

Door	Condition	Everyday name	Liturgical (Maiethren)	The fresh angle
died with work unfinished	Returned	the Quiet Tally	Threnvaeth (THREN-vayth) — “the counted waiting”	Not Hades, not a reaper. A clerk of leftover purpose . Will not close the book while work remains. Warm-solemn, like the Returned themselves.
a contract sworn in extremity	Bound (and the Unbound when the term ends)	the Counterparty	Orledd (or-LED) — “the witnessed reckoning”	Not a devil. The one who answers a sworn ask and keeps the term. The Bound’s chosen face (demon / vast / unknown) is a mask they gave ; Orledd wears it.
survived drowning	Far-Voiced (Struck path)	the Second Breath	Eloren (ay-LOR-en) — “the deep-witness”	Not Poseidon. The deep that returns a voice . The Given Far-Voiced is hers; the drowned one is Eloren’s.
survived being turned to stone	the Stilled (Struck path)	the Holding	Ornhael (orn-HAYL) — “the whole-ground”	Not a curse-god. The ground that holds you still and lets you walk out .
lost and dying in the deep wild	the Taken-In (Struck path)	the Taking	Vaelorn (VAYL-orn) — “the yield-land”	Not a hungry forest. The land that will not let you die unmade — vael in the Old Ways’ older sense.

Collective everyday name: the Other Hands (she is the First Hand; they are the rest). They do not have temples of their own on the mainland as a set — the Motherfaith grew over that memory. The rival faiths kept pieces.

The names of the Other Hands may still take a final polish. The division of labour is settled.

Allowance and purchase

- Allowance is hers. An Other Hand cannot Strike a Condition outside their door, cannot Give at a Tree, cannot exceed what she has permitted. This is also why the Struck feel received-but-unmet-by-ceremony: a lesser hand, at the edge, by permission.

- Purchase is not clerical magic and not “pray for a domain spell.” An Other Hand reaches more easily where their door is kept — funerals and unfinished work (Threnvaeth), oaths and books (Orledd), drowning-water (Eloren), stone and stillness (Ornhael), wild and grove (Vaelorn). On the mainland those doors exist even for skeptics; the world is full of them. Belief helps; geography and practice matter more.
- Her Giving does not need worship. Skeptics still Turn. The Trees are her hands, not her collection plate. The Leaf-Fall is not faith-gated.

What this does to the schism

- Narrow-Hand is right: she Gives only at the Tree; the Struck received by some other means.
- Wide-Hand is right: those means are still hers — her household, her allowance, her catch at the edge.
- Neither holds the whole.
- The Watching remembered a household before it was named Mother. Half-right.
- The Fair Hand is right about Bound (there is a Counterparty) and wrong that every becoming is a bargain. Mother’s Gifts are still gifts.
- The Old Ways are right that land-doors are real (Vaelorn, Ornhael, Eloren) and wrong that she is only a latecomer claiming credit. She authorized the guests.
- The Open Table is not of this household. Do not absorb Kumbaan’s staying-kin into Threnvaeth or anyone else. Their table is their own.

A household does not make the Leaf-Fall a committee. Giving is still love; the Tithe is still honest weight. The Other Hands are not a dark pantheon. Threnvaeth is why the Returned are respected, not why they are a plague. Narrow-Hand does not win; she authorized the catch. The stigma stays social, not cosmological abandonment.

How the household surfaces

Keep this behind the keystone’s own clue-ladder. Do not lead with a pantheon.

1. Struck testimony splits. Some felt a mother. Some felt a clerk, a term, a deep, a holding, a green. The Motherfaith files all of it as “she caught them.” The Old Ways and the Fair Hand file it as their own doors. Both filings are half-true.
2. A Returned who settles sometimes speaks of a book closing — not a lap. Threnvaeth, if you are listening.
3. Bound faces disagree and the terms do not. Demon, vast, unknown — the clause is the same shape. Orledd wearing masks.

4. The Watching's lintel (“we kept the watch before the name”) is about a household, not only a nameless Tree.
 5. Kumbaan as control. Almost no Struck; no Given. If the household needed only doors, the isle would be full of them. Purchase matters. The storm-wall is a reach-edge and a name-edge.
 6. The confirming beat (late). If the campaign ever names the Other Hands, it should feel like the family was always in the next room — warmth with an ache, not a lore dump. Pair it with the keystone's own confirming beat or let it land after. Never first.

Yumboes and Kumbaan

- No Tree because a graft has not crossed the storm-wall — not because the good people refused one. The isle is almost impossible to reach. Their culture is centred on something else (the Open Table, the moon, the hill, hospitality). Different ideals, different sacred.
- No Gifts on the isle. Her reach does not get there. There is no Leaf-Fall. Yumboes do not have Given Conditions as a people.
- They do not worship her or her household, so the Other Hands have little purchase — the doors are not kept in their names, the rites are not theirs. This is not “gods starve without prayer.” It is: a Hand reaches through a door that is used. On Kumbaan those doors are barely a concept.
- Struck can still happen, at far smaller percentages than the mainland's ~15% lifetime Struck. A Yumboe who dies with work unfinished, or drowns, or is taken by the deep green of the Paps, can be caught — rarely. Enough for a story. Not enough to be a social class. No Returned neighbourhoods; no Bound guilds.
- A Yumboe abroad, standing under a mainland Tree, is a live campaign beat, not a population fact. The Tree is her hand; she could Give. It almost never arises. There is no racial immunity.

The Isle remains the sharpest experiment: a people outside her Giving, barely inside her household's reach, with a faith that was never hers.

Yumboes are unreached, not refused. A graft that cannot travel is not a judgment.

“Spirits of the dead” is folklore, not literal here. The source myth calls Yumboes ghosts/ancestral spirits. They are a living people (a playable Kind); the ancestral flavour is their faith's self-image — a people who venerate hill, moon, and lineage and speak of themselves in the old ancestral idiom. They are not literally undead (that's the Returned's lane).

The storm-wall is a dial, not a lock. Whether it can be crossed — and how — is a GM lever. A permanent absolute wall kills the expedition hook; a seasonal thinning, a known-but-deadly passage, or a Condition/Kind that can survive it keeps the door usable when the story wants it.

Kumbaan stays off the clerk's list on purpose. A later campaign may reach it; it is not a great power. A wrecked pot in a sailor's story is allowed. A taking is not. Road-hands do not bring the Mother across the storm-wall. Finding an old scion on the Isle would break the isolate and the Open Table.

The map as the edge

The reach-gradient (dense core → thin frontier → Treeless isle) is the ground-level face of the Mother's bounded reach. In-world it reads as plain distance-and-history: the ages explain today's thin edges as Tree-poor places (young/sick/few grafts) and as the front of a wave still moving on Heskoren, and the skeptics take that as the whole truth. It is most of the truth. The part that stays GM-side is why the grafts thin with distance from Thaeloren — that her reach itself has an edge.

Never let a player-facing region note assert the deeper cause; let it read as geography.

Maiethorn is the “control” end of the natural experiment — Trees healthiest, Given densest. Keep the cause GM-side (her reach is fullest at the source); in-world it's just “the oldest, best-tended Trees.”

Strandoren has Trees as healthy as Maiethorn's but wears the faith lightly: the reason the Given are dense here is the same as anywhere (healthy grafts), and the reason the faith is thin is purely social (commerce erodes devotion). Keep those two facts separate in-world; don't let the cool faith read as thin reach or vice versa. The eroded language drift is the tell — smooth because secular, not because Tree-poor.

Heskoren is the sharpest in-world test of the keystone edge. The Waiting Lands are the place a devout population most wants an explanation for the thin gift. The true answer (her reach is bounded and thins where the Trees are thin) is exactly the answer that would land hardest and cruellest here — it would confirm the guilt-theology's worst fear. Never let a player-facing note assert it. In-world the thin reach is young/sick/scarce grafts (true as far as it goes) and history (Clock 2 still moving). The gap between “true as far as it goes” and the whole truth is where the play lives.

The Sundering Isle is the strongest keystone experiment. A near-Treeless land whose people become what they become without the Leaf-Fall is the cleanest natural test of whether the Mother is behind any of it. No Gifts (no graft has crossed; her reach does not get there); Struck are rare (the household has little purchase where it is unknown and the doors are not kept); their Kind and their table are their own, not a subtler Tree. Don't resolve a lone Yumboe's Struck-or-not in session one — it's still a late beat.

East/west is not settled cosmology. Only the relative positions matter. If a later map or campaign wants the gradient to run north → south or along a different axis, that's free — the gradient is the canon, not the compass.

The heartland heresy is a keystone keeper. The Watching sits at the sacred center precisely so an old faith can hold old memory — what was believed before the Trees were called Hers. It's the natural in-world source that could corroborate the keystone from an unexpected direction (not the skeptics, not the devout — the heretics).

Three old faiths, three edges, one buried truth. The Open Table joins the Watching and the Old Ways as the world's three keystone-adjacent religions — each grown far from (or before) the Motherfaith's account, each possibly preserving a fragment of what the Trees really are. The Isle's is the purest control: a cosmology with zero Motherfaith contamination. If a campaign triangulates the keystone, these three are the corners.

The Old Ways may be half-right for the wrong reasons. They revere the Struck and Taken-In as the land's own, made without the Tree — and on a near-Treeless frontier, people genuinely do become things without a healthy Tree nearby. That's a live thread: they are the frontier mirror of the Watching — two old faiths, at opposite edges of the world, both remembering something the Motherfaith smooths over. Whether they're right about the Mother stays keystone-gated. Host-rights do not dissolve when the keystone lands.

The Fair Hand is a rival reading of the true gifts, not a false one. The Conditions are real gifts — the cult calls them bargains, the Motherfaith calls them blessings, and both are interpretations laid over the same real thing. Neither is confirmed by any reveal. The cult is wrong about who (no bargain was struck), but its adherents are as sincere as the Motherfaith's. Don't play it as villain-theology. Leddvael is that reading made civic.

The solstice-timing is a two-reading fact. Believers: the Mother times her choosing to the year's hinge. Skeptics: the Trees are photoperiod-sensitive plants that colour with the light, and the “choosing” is biology. She is real — so the believers are right about who, the skeptics right about the mechanism (she works through the Trees' real nature, not against it). Don't resolve it in player text; the calendar works identically either way.

Kumbaan's lunar calendar is the sharpest small tell in the world. The Yumboes keep the moon, not the solstice, because the Trees never reached them — a whole people whose reckoning of time has no Leaf-Fall in it at all. It reads in-world as mere cultural difference. It is also the keystone experiment: the one calendar the Mother's Trees demonstrably never shaped. Reserve the significance; let it look like colour.

Whoever keeps the dates holds power. No printing press → calendars are hand-kept by clergy and clerks. The tree-wardens set Turning-Week; the Tallied Crown's clerks record it. A campaign lever: a disputed date, a miscounted cohort, a child Turned a year “late” because someone kept the calendar wrong (or made them). Cut-years vs house-years vs “the year the graft took” is the same lever aimed at history.

Astronomy is deliberately shallow. One sun, one moon, two solstices — enough to run the rite and date events. If a later story wants eclipses, comets, or a second moon as omen-material, that's open space, not a contradiction; nothing above depends on the sky being simple beyond the solstice.

Every scion is continuous tissue of the one Tree, so the First Cut really did move a Hand. Player-facing, that is doctrine. The growth of reach with grafts is the quiet argument for a mind; it is not a licence to narrate her standing over the first knife. Skeptics still win the mundane reading (horticulture, ships, soil). Both readings share the same wave.

The ages, GM-side

The two clocks protect the keystone without confirming it. Clock 2 (the wave) is the player-facing face of “reach grew with the grafts” — the quiet argument that a hand, not a climate, is behind the thinning. Skeptics still win the mundane reading (young/sick/few grafts, distance, history). Both readings share the same map. Do not let a player-facing era note assert the mind.

The present is not post-history. Especially on Heskoren. Narrating Ornthael as “the modern age after the Grafting” re-creates stacked ages. Two clocks. The wave is live. A sick Tree in the core puts a Hands-town back on the neighbour's week; that is Clock 1 flipping, not an age ending.

Heskoren is not “living in the past.” A hamlet sending this year's ten-year-olds to a neighbour is doing Clock 2, present tense. A hamlet sending them all the way to Thaeloren is doing Clock 1, present tense. Do not narrate either as re-enactment.

The Grafting is not a redemption arc for society. Local Trees did not abolish Struck stigma, Tithe-leverage, guild conscription, or the pitied Kept. They relocated who gets a local witness and who waits on a queue. The scion-queue is the Hands-era injustice grown from a Walking-era mercy. Confirming she is kind does not make the queue fair. The Seat's narration (“her will travelling”) is a claim, not a solvent.

Do not run the colonial version. “We brought Trees to the benighted far” is the Seat's after-the-fact sermon and Lestrang's supply-chain story. The thing that happened is shorter and worse: children died on the road, someone cut a branch, it took, people copied it, the Seat claimed the copy-right. Heskoren still experiences the wave as waiting, not as having been given civilization. The Old Ways experience it as guests arriving late. Keep all three.

The Walking did not make far people spiritually deficient. Distance did. Vaethorn's guilt-theology is a Hands-era reading of a Walking-era fact. Old Ways refusal is not “missing the gift”; it is a different door. Do not let history agree with the guilt.

The one-week door is the engine's teeth. If eleven-year-olds Turn Given “because they tried,” the split household and the held-over year lose their bite. Struck remains the later door. That is enough mercy.

Protect the two-sided memory. Devout Hands-era storytellers will want Brenvaeth as holy traffic — every child a pilgrim, every summer a hymn. Skeptics will want it as biology plus bad roads. Both are using the era. The graves make the hymn expensive; the hymn makes the graves a meaning. Play both. The fables refuse to pick.

The gap (C.Y. 160–200) is load-bearing. Not empty time and not a punishment. Dead wood on the Long Mile, a chain that had to mature, a queue that preferred a paying next. Filling the gap with a crusade or a miracle-crossing launders the list.

Who made the First Cut is unpicked. A named first Road-hand, a named parent, a named saint, is a taste call if play needs a tomb. A face makes a great-man history; the engine is wood and waiting. The five attributions are the play. Collapsing them in GM voice is how you accidentally write a gospel.

Rithnali says Tree, the later Cutting-leave says Mother. The early paper has not finished the overlay. Dual-practice, an old Speaker, or the college still arguing the name — playable, not a gotcha. Do not “correct” the minute.

Before the Walk is the 20% inscrutable. Resist the urge to fill it. The Watching and the Old Ways already hold the two usable memories (seeing without a mother; doors without a graft). A third “true prehistory” would flatten both. The Tree standing before it was called Hers is compatible with she is real and with “the Mother-name is later.” This era does not decide what she is. The maternal intent is settled; her metaphysical species is not.

Long-Lived memory is the era-marker the calendar refused to be. At C.Y. 387, plenty of deathless people remember the late Walking as biography. They are walking archives, and they do not agree — memory is perfect; meaning is not. A Long-Lived who walked as a child and a Seat chronicle that starts at the Cut will fight about the same summer. That fight is play. Do not have “the” Long-Lived account.

Historical fate-shifts (already happened). (1) road-houses → deathless banks (reformation); (2) unsanctioned cutting → Cutting-leave and the queue (absorption of a heresy by an institution); (3) required pilgrimage → optional pilgrimage (the institution survives by changing function). Present-day fate-pressure is noted, not rolled: First Seat peak and heavy; Road-hands overextended at the Heskoren front; waiting towns precarious; deathless houses peak-and-reformed.

Two fates of the road-house is the leftover's contradiction. The White Note House collected. The Third Hearth kept making the bed. Both are honest. Lestrang will only count the first as success. Play both. Do not have “the” deathless account of the road. Mataero's blindness is the document: junior who must believe the house is a bank that happens to have rooms. House custom is the credit.

Colonial trap, present tense. Maiethorn visitors on Heskoren will read necessity as devotion (they still walk, how faithful). Prestige-walkers will read necessity as poverty-theatre. Vaethorn will read delay as unworthiness. The thing that is happening is shorter: a child needs a canopy this week. Keep all three misreadings available. Do not let GM voice agree with any of them.

The fables' paradox is the point. You cannot know the distance without the graves, and you cannot honour the graves without using them as a map. You cannot share a Hand without wounding a Hand, and you cannot name a First without inventing a Second that waits. You cannot honour the leftover without using it, and you cannot use it without pretending, a little, that the road is still the road — or that it is over. Removing the paradox leaves a hymn or a logistics manual. Keep both counts.

Do not add “and then the Mother walked with them,” “and then she told them to cut,” or “and then she moved the stone.” That closes the keystone in a children’s story. The confirming warmth, if it comes, is not these stories. The branch is her tissue; the stories must not say so. Do not pick a last line in GM voice. Which mouth an NPC offers is a faster read than a speech.

There is no official ribbon-colour. A copper-green rag is not a Taken-In. If a warden “reads” mile-shrine ribbons as leaf-colours, they are doing Hands-era overlay on Walking-era rag. Useful as a wrong NPC; do not make it doctrine.

Places, GM-side

Harrow’s Green is not the “good town” that waited faithfully. They were a paying-enough, soil-enough, chain-enough next on a list written in the Motherwood. Luck is horticulture plus the queue. Vaethorn will preach otherwise. The Harrow-sentence is a tell: when an NPC says it as nostalgia, they are Maiethorn; when they say it as this year, they are the front; when they say it as a slight (they Turned at Harrow’s because they had no Hand), they are a hamlet. One leftover job: necessity. A ribbon on the stone is texture, not a second theme. A First-Hand-year household here is lost, rich, or lying. Keep the hamlets visible from the square in at least one sightline. “The soil was right here” is horticulture; Haelin does not assert the mind.

The Three Hamlets are not living in the past. A hamlet sending this year’s ten-year-olds to Harrow’s is doing the present. They wait because the wood is slow, the road is long, and the list was written in the Motherwood. Not because they were unworthy. Confirming she is kind does not plant the scion. Fate-pressure: precarious — single dependency on Harrow’s week or a pot. Do not wipe the cluster to make the queue feel real. The pressure is the play. Seam, not a planet-of-hats: all four voices (Saelvaeth luck / Vaelhesk refusal / Vaethorn guilt / Ornled slate) can sit in one week. Brenod leans sending, Vaelun leans refusal, Ornath leans the other road — leans, not flags. Which green has the sick stick waits on a session.

The Third Hearth is not a failure. The White Note collected. The Third Hearth kept making the bed. Do not have Thilim “lose” because the paper went to the coast. One leftover job on the street: devotion / extra mile. Necessity in the loft is Thilim’s eye, not a second town-theme. Prestige that lands here is the household that missed the White Note. Orenbren is many hearths. Brenthael is a neighbour square, not a capital. Thilim’s four jobs stay disagreed. Do not pick which sermon they are. Do not kill Thilim to close the Held bed. The stone is a day’s water and a name; it does not assert the mind.

Ornsael is not a Kitsune nation. Sands-Fox densest. Mixed Kinds. A fox-market is a neighbourhood, not a quarter-with-a-gate. Pair with Saelvaeth / Harrow’s Green: same sowing-root, two continents, both present tense. A party that has only seen Heskoren waiting should meet this well and have to recalibrate. A party that has only seen the Sacred Core should meet the west-road and lose the stacked-age. One leftover job: necessity. Thin take in dry soil stays horticulture in player text. Plenty next door does not make the leftover kind. Confirming she is kind does not retire the west-road. Ornsael is not Saelthael’s capital.

Eolvaeth is not the “good town” that waited faithfully. They were an early pot that stayed thin. Congregation did the rest. Luck is horticulture plus the queue. Not Saelvaeth’s march. Harrow’s is luck you can see from a ford. Eolvaeth is a gospel you walk to. Pair them in a campaign week if you want both leftover jobs of Heskoren visible; do not collapse them into one frontier flavour. One leftover job: devotion / the wait as destination. A cohort sent toward Saelvaeth is friction, not a second theme. The spring is the water. The wet leaf is not a ribbon. The absence of a mile-shrine is the leftover. A pretty pilgrim-town whose leftover is only picturesque agrees with Vaethorn guilt. Keep a thin year visible. Confirming she is kind does not make the wait a virtue. “The soil was never quite right here” is horticulture.

Orentel: the White Note is not the crown. The desk is one house on the third quay. The council is many tickets. A party that only meets Ledan has not met Orentel. One leftover job: prestige / First-Hand year as product. Necessity in the loft is texture, not a second theme. Empty berths and earth-holds are this street’s leftover. Salt on the roots is not a ribbon. Hallowquay stays a lesser quay — a neighbourhood byname, not a retcon of the capital. Dense Given stay horticulture-and-trade in player text. Confirming she is kind does not make the hold kind. A rich city stepping around a fade is the Coast’s injustice at eye level.

Maiethlir does not capture the First Seat. Proximity is pressure. A First Seat that is the Threnhael is a different (darker) setting. Keep the college able to refuse the roll — and keep Rithim as the local version of that refusal, incomplete. This is a Hand beside a thaw-river. The grove is a dark on the horizon. Orenbren lodges the other road. Brenthael is a neighbour of an inn, not this capital. One leftover job: devotion / extra mile, layered. The census is the layer, not the postcard. Tablets, a loud thaw, clerk-dorms in old lofts. The unfiled Held bed is a rumour the roll has not found — a different leftover, not Seine’s lintel moved to the counted city. Maiethvael is the argument next door. Same maieth, opposite paper. Do not make them the kind foil (piety as a social tax in plenty). Dense Given stay horticulture in player text. The loud river is not her voice unless a later reveal earns it — and even then the social-injustice guard holds. Confirming she is kind does not make the counted channel kind. Devotion sanctifies the surveillance; the surveillance enforces the devotion. No clean villain.

Name-pairs as tells. Maiethvael / Threnmaieth is the Motherland's argument in two names: Mother's gift vs Mother's reckoning. Same maieth, opposite paper. Saelthael / Saelvaeth share sael (sowing) on two continents — Clock 2 still moving at the origin and the front. Do not narrate one as history and the other as frontier flavour. Trenledd's etymology: Thren worn to Tren is the sacred count with the sacred worn off — same machinery Threnmaieth sanctifies, named as what it does. A scholar-PC may notice; do not gloss it in player text as a clever pun. The vael/vaeth pair: Yield vs waiting. Same continent, opposite first syllable. Vaethorn and Vaelhesk already feel it.

Theology and reach stay independent. High reach, cooled faith on Eolstrand is the same pairing Strandoren proves, on the conservative shore. Do not let mid-hymns read as thin Trees.

Netstrand's neth. Why night sits on this west shore is not fully explained — night-watches, storm-wall dark, a Watching-flavoured eve-custom that does not belong this far west — pick in play, or never.

Ornled is not freedom. Light state plus thin Trees plus no faith-net is exposure. Do not agree with Vaethorn that Ornled is unworthy. Distance and a choice of gospel. Horticulture plus culture.

Hearths, not nations, everywhere. Tengu densest in Lirorn; Snows-Fox densest there; Sands-Fox densest in Saelthael; Selkie common on Eolstrand and Netstrand; Taken-In honoured in Vaelhesk. Mixed Kinds. The interesting PC is a human or Selkie of Lirorn, or a Tengu of Eolstrand. A wing-post is a job. The moment the government is for a Kind, the two-layer model has started to rot.

Threnmaieth's tell lives on Maiethorn. The Tallied Crown distrusts the three pillars and keeps a ledger instead — and its Long-Lived crown-archivists may quietly remember what the Threnhael was made to overwrite. On Maiethorn, that archivist is near the sacred center and near the old heresy.

Strandoren is the natural staging ground for Isle expeditions. If a campaign ever reaches for the Sundering Isle, the ships, the money, and the tall tales all originate here. Netstrand is the natural berth. The merchant who “crossed the storm-wall” is a Strandor archetype — hold whether the claim is true as a live question tied to the Isle's reveal.

A pretty road-end town whose leftover is only picturesque launders the graves. A waiting cluster whose only note is “poor and faithful” agrees with Vaethorn guilt. Write the job, not the postcard. Thin/sick/few grafts stay the player-facing cause. Do not let a seed-note assert the mind.

What is settled and what is open Settled.

- The Leaf-Mother is real, benevolent, bounded, and costly. The Trees are her hands. The Conditions are real gifts. The Tithe is honest weight.
- She Gives; she does not Strike. The Other Hands Strike under her allowance. The Struck are still hers.
- Yumboes: no Gifts; Struck rare. Unreached, not refused. The Open Table is not of her household.
- The map is a reach-gradient. Four continents. Maiethorn first, Strandoren by sea, Heskoren last and live, Kumbaan never.
- Present: Cut-year 387. Two clocks. No universal year-zero. Dating reveals stance.
- The Tree is undated. Before the Walk has no start.
- High-Solstice Turning-Week. Twelve Maiethren months. Three new-year days by stance. Kumbaan keeps twelve moons.
- Fifteen powers (three corners + twelve). Kumbaan is not on the list.
- The First Seat is a college beside Maiethlir, not a throne and not captured. The White Note is placed on Orentel, not crowned. Harrow's Green and Ornsael are not capitals.
- Fate-pressure on the First Seat, Road-hands, waiting towns, and deathless houses is visible. It has not been rolled.

Open.

- The nature of her limit. That her reach has an edge and giving costs her is settled. Why — is she finite by nature, spent from some old wound, rationing a power that could run out, holding something back to hold something else up? — is unwritten. That carrying wood moved the edge is already evidence of a hand. It is not an explanation of the wound, the finitude, or the rationing. The ache is settled. The cause is not. A wound-in-the-deep-past is one available cause among several; Before the Walk does not pick it.
- Who made the First Cut. Contested on purpose. Folk / clergy / devout / Watching / Old Ways each have a lived story. History does not pick a face. Pick only if play needs a tomb.
- What she is (a goddess? the Trees' shared soul? something older wearing a mother's face for our comfort?) — undecided; the maternal, benevolent intent is settled, not her metaphysical species.
- What she wants, beyond giving good gifts — undecided. She is kind; her larger purpose (if any) is unwritten.
- Where she is / whether she can be reached — undecided. Revelation is deliberately quiet; there is no throne to visit.
- Whether the storm-wall can be crossed, and how — a GM lever, not a settled fact.

- Why neth sits on Netstrand's shore — not fully explained.
- Which of the three hamlets' greens has the sick stick — waits on a session.
- Household names (Quiet Tally / Counterparty / Second Breath / Holding / Taking, and their Maiethren forms) — polishable; the structure is settled.
- Astronomy beyond one sun, one moon, two solstices — open space if a later story wants eclipses, comets, or a second moon as omen-material.
